Politicians Use Old Time Tactics

Durham, N. C. (U.P.)—The politician who "points with pride" or "views with alarm," might think he's the best orator since the hey-day of Greece, but his vote-getting tactics are age-old.

Dr. Clarence H. Schettler, Duke University sociologist, in his new "Public Opinion and Propaganda," says the soap-box phonies are following a recipe written centuries ago.

The sociologist points out that an Englishman, Richard Hooker, wrote a politicians' handbook in the 17th century which included every trick of the modern demagogue.

"Persuade the gullible," Hooker told the office-seekers of the 1600's. He added that "women are the most gullible."

"That's sure fire," Dr. Schettler said. "Our society still produces women submissive by nature and prone to be attracted enough by a candidate's manner and physical appearance to believe whatever he says."

Two more of Hooker's standbys were: "Point out the faults of your topmost opponent" and "impute all present corruption to the opposition."

"No comment necessary," Dr. Schettler said. "Just listen."

Another good tactic, Hooker said three centuries ago, is to "propose your own program—with glorious titles—as the only remedy for existing evils."

For an example of that time-worn device, Dr. Schettler said, notice the "Communist-front organizations which flourish under such safe titles as 'American Youth for Democracy.'"

Another ingredient of the successful campaign, Hooker said Germany's Dr. Goebbels proved that.

And last, the 17th century sage advised, "direct your thinking so that the Scriptures will appear to give support to your program."

"Do we still use that?" Dr. Schettler asked. "When was the last time you heard a politician say, 'God is on our side?'"

Work for the Wave Forecasting Naval Forces

Berkeley, Cal. (U.P.)—Something new is being added to weather forecasts in the form of predicting the size and time of arrival of ocean waves.

A group of University of California engineers, headed by Prof. Joe W. Johnson, is making an extensive study of waves for the Navy's burden of ships.

Although fishermen, shippers and harbor engineers now are given accurate local weather reports, they often have been crossed up by unpredictable waves generated by storms up to 5,000 miles away. The condition of the sea and surf often has no connection with local weather conditions.

Waves Carry Far
Johnson describes waves as "packages of energy" built by wind. The velocity, duration and extent of the wind determines the speed, size and power of waves. Once started, a wave can carry its power undiminished for thousands of miles.

The theory of "wave forecasting" has been worked out by the University of California's Scripps Institution of Oceanography. The system is based on the complex relationship between wind and wave characteristics.

The engineers used Abbots Lagoon at Point Reyes, Cal., and Clear Lake to confirm their theory. Now, with wind data from weather maps and forecast graphs, the Berkeley engineers are able to predict the height, length and time of arrival of waves at many distant points.

Forecasts Accurate
To make wave forecasting more accurate, they checked 271 forecasts over a nine-month period against actual results recorded at Point Sur, Cal. Another 201 forecasts during an eight-month period were compared with records on instruments at Heceta Head, Ore. Johnson said the predictions turned out to be remarkably accurate.

Besides being a valuable warning to marine operators and an aid to planners of amphibious military operations, Johnson points out that the wave study can be put to use in any particular locality. Wave studies would be particularly valuable to persons designing shore structures and to trans-oceanic shipping and air routes.

More wave recorders are being installed on the California and Washington coasts and at Guam. The instruments are installed 60 feet below the water surface and keep a constant record of every variation of the sea.

West Liberty, W. Va. (U.P.)—Students at West Liberty State are making their jewelry these days instead of buying it. It is part of an art department course instituted by instructor Ruth Vest, who says the work combines the originality of the amateur with the refinement of the professional.
