Richardson's appointment as governor of Nebraska came after his defeat for the governorship. The first time President Buchanan offered him the post he refused, but finally in December, 1857, he was persuaded to accept.

Governor Richardson served Nebraska territory only a year, but it was one full of problems resulting in many a headache for the chief executive.

The basic difficulty arose out of a conflict in the legislature which had torn that body asunder, and when the Governor arrived he found that part of the legislature had vacated the territorial capital at Omaha and was in session at Florence. This group invited the new governor to co-operate with them, but that he refused to do. Instead, he insisted that they return to the regular territorial capital.

One of Richardson's principal acts of governor was to call the legislature into special session to take action correcting the "great confusion and uncertainty" which in his judgment characterized the laws of the territory. He issued this call on August 14, 1858, just two days before his resignation to take effect January 1, 1859.

He left the territory about a month before his resignation was to take effect, returning to Illinois to run for his old seat in the House of Representatives. He was elected, and in 1862 he was sent to the Senate to fill out the term of his old friend, Stephen H. Douglas, who had died.

Although his term of office was short, Governor Richardson succeeded in bringing order out of the chaos existing in territorial affairs when he arrived. He has been credited with having "produced the best state papers ever submitted to this commonwealth" marked by "maturity, brevity, and straightforward simplicity, with a strong paternal appeal."

When William A. Richardson was appointed governor of Nebraska territory in 1858, he enjoyed the distinction of already having a county named in his honor. Richardson County was so named by Acting Governor T. B. Cumming when the territorial government was organized in 1854. At that time, Mr. Richardson was a member of congress from Illinois, and had been instrumental in the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska bill.

Born and reared in Kentucky, William A. Richardson moved to Illinois as a young man, where he engaged in the practice of law and soon became active in politics. He served several terms in the Illinois legislature, and during one of these was Speaker of the House of Representatives. He represented an Illinois district in the House of Representatives from 1847 to 1856, when he resigned to run for governor of Illinois on the Democratic ticket.
