Devise Tests For Voice Defects

New York (U.P.)—Tulane University psychologists have devised a picture vocabulary to test the measure of intelligence of children who are vocally or muscularly handicapped.

The test is simple and requires only 10 or 15 minutes. It is believed to be the only test that will determine reliably the learning capacity of all children, except the deaf and blind.

Dr. Robert Ammons, assistant professor of psychology at Tulane, and his wife, a candidate for a doctor's degree in clinical psychology, devised the test. It will determine the capacity of a two-year-old child or a mentally superior adult.

Matches Words
The test is composed of 16 plates, each with four line drawings, picturing a wide variety of subject matter. The child or adult being tested need only to indicate in some way which of the drawings best illustrates a given word.

A child with a speech impediment, for example, may point to the right picture-answer. If a child has trouble pointing, he may nod, wink his eyes, grunt or indicate in some other way.

Words on a card are read until three are passed consecutively or failed, and until all 16 plates have been covered. Questions are scaled accordingly.

Checked Against Norm
Thus a child might respond to a picture of a head-on collision when he heard the word "accident." An adult might respond to the word "negligence." Similarly, a child would indicate the picture of another child in tears at the word "crying." An adult might respond to the word "lacrymation."

Tests scores are determined by a master "norm key." The passes from all cards are totaled and the equivalent mental age is read from the list of norms based on 589 representative testing cases, ranging in age from two years to adult.

Dr. Ammons said 29 would be a normal grade for a child of seven. The perfect score for an adult would be 85, which would occur with one adult out of 200 or 300.

One Mistake Too Many
ITASCA, Tex. (U.P.)—A youth made a double mistake when he tried to sell a radio here. First, the radio was stolen; and second, the youth's prospective customer was the city marshal. The marshal then learned the youth had escaped from a boy's industrial school.
