OUT OF OLD NEBRASKA

by JAMES C. OLSON, Superintendent of STATE HISTORICAL SOCIETY
 "Nothing in American history," writes Bernard De Voto in The Year of Decision: 1846, "is like Winter Quarters. An entire people had uprooted itself and, on the way to the mountains, paused here and put down roots."

Winter Quarters—now Florence, a suburb of Omaha—was a haven during the winter 1846-47 for persecuted Mormons fleeing westward to escape the wrath of Nauvoo, and for many years thereafter was an important outfitting and jumping-off place for Mormon emigrants bound for the Great Salt Lake.

It was by no means a healthy haven. The Saints themselves called the Missouri bottoms, "Misery Bottoms." The name is borne out by the fact that over 600 of the faithful died during that first winter; and even Brigham Young, their stalwart leader, was sick much of the time.

Young, "with a number of prominent brethren," reach the Missouri on June 14, 1846, crossing the river on the 29th. According to one account they crossed on a boat especially built for them; according to another, they used a boat belonging to Peter A. Sarpy, the noted fur trader.

Be that as it may, throughout the summer the Mormons crossed the river in great numbers, some by a Mormon ferry and some by Sarpy's. By the end of the season there were more than 12,000 Mormons camped along both sides of the river, and Winter Quarters boasted a population of approximately 3,500.

The village contained 533 log cabins and 83 sod houses, arranged symmetrically in streets. Schools and churches, as well as a considerable industry, were established by the Mormons at their temporary home. The women made large numbers of willow baskets, and a flour mill reported to have cost $9,000 was set up.

Brigham Young's administrative genius was well displayed at Winter Quarters. It was there that a cumbersome form of ecclesiastical organization was adapted to life on the plains and in the wilderness. That Young's adaptations were successful at disease-ridden Winter Quarters is eloquent testimony to the skill with which they were devised and administered.

As I have indicated, for most Mormons Winter Quarters was but a stopping-place. Some, though, disaffected or unable to make the hazardous journey across the plains, remained on the banks of the Missouri; and Winter Quarters was part of a considerable area of settlement intimately associated with the very earliest history of Council Bluffs and Omaha.

Mad Over Bridge
 KNOXVILLE, Tenn. (AP)—Mrs. Margaret Josephine Maples sued for divorce because, she said in her petition, her husband Victor grew "furious" in a bridge game when he did not make a bid. He accused her of causing him to over-bid and threw his cards on the floor.

Mrs. C. C. Osterholm of Glenwood, was in the city Friday to spend the day visiting with her son and daughter-in-law, Mr. and Mrs. Leo Osterholm and grandson Richard. She accompanied Mr. Osterholm, plant superintendent at the Journal, as he came over to work.

Mrs. Dwight Talcott and daughter, Dorothy, were in Omaha on Friday.

Captain and Mrs. Geo. Skinner and children were Omaha visitors Saturday.

Mr. and Mrs. Clark Finney spent Saturday evening with Captain and Mrs. Vincent Braun at their home.
