Intestinal Disease For Baby Pigs Said Most Serious

With thousands of fall pigs being farrowed this month, swine owners were today alerted against the threat of transmissible gastroenteritis, said to be the most serious baby pig intestinal disease ever seen in North America.

No farm can consider itself completely safe from this deadly disease, the American Foundation for Animal Health warned today.

"Transmissible gastroenteritis has wiped out entire pig crops on some farms. Although it attacks swine of all ages, young pigs under two weeks of age are its principal victims," the report said.

"Symptoms include severe scouring and dehydration. There is a rapid loss of flesh even though affected pigs continue to nurse until they die. Its victims usually die in three to five days. Those which recover are likely to be stunted in growth."

"Control hinges on keeping healthy breeding stock and healthy litters completely out of contact with sick animals and away from houses and grounds where outbreaks have occurred."

"Sows ready to farrow should not be moved into the central hog house if there has been an outbreak there. Pigs dying of the disease, as well as exposed ones, should be left where they are, and handled according to the veterinarian's recommendations. Attempting to move the sick animal to a new place will only contaminate additional parts of the farm."
