

Education Better Than Ever Before - Gustavson

Trying to understand the other's point of view is one of the greatest developments of modern education, Dr. R. G. Gustavson, chancellor of the University of Nebraska, told nearly 100 delegates to the First District convention of the Nebraska Federation of Women's Clubs meetings here Tuesday.

Control of creativity, racial and religious discrimination are still elements of present day life which must be overcome through education, Gustavson said.

The Chancellor's address, "Building Bridges in Education" was a highlight of the first day's activity of the 48th annual convention of the district group.

Explaining that to almost every problem there are "two points of view," Dr. Gustavson cited instances which left the many women delegates wondering which point of view might be correct.

But in spite of the need for stressing these points in present day education, the Chancellor said he believes that the nation has "never done a better job in education than right now."

That education, he explained, originates with the elementary grades where youngsters are taught the basic elements of reading, writing, spelling and arithmetic, which stimulate thinking. In higher education, in the high schools and colleges, students are given a broader concept and are induced to see "the other point of view," Dr. Gustavson said.

"Education today fits the child" and individual characteristics and abilities are recognized, in the opinion of Dr. Gustavson. But a broader approach is needed in "building bridges in education."

The Chancellor's address closed Tuesday afternoon activities. Other highlights of the afternoon session included an address by Mrs. F. H. Earmore, second vice president of the Nebraska Federation, who spoke on "Key to Happiness." She generally recognized the beauty of an individual's surroundings, and pointed out that happiness can be gained through one's own environment.

Also on the Tuesday schedule was reports of the district chairmen, group singing, solos, greetings by local officials and civic leaders.

The sessions were held at the First Methodist church, also the scene of the Tuesday night banquet. A junior conference was also held during the afternoon.
