KUKU bumped along merrily from crisis to crisis, always just pennies away from bankruptcy. The station manager was arrested by government officials for broadcasting on a wider range than he was paying for. Next the Reverend A. H. Kramer, conductor of the Hour of Family Prayer, was apprehended for selling "splinters off the original manger." The Reverend went the way of the station manager. Then there was the "Magic Inner Magic Eye," clad in racoon skin coat and derby and always smelling of bathtub gin, who during the midnight half hour, advised the lovelorn, told fortunes, found missing people, but "made no claim to supernatural powers." These are but three of the hilarious characters who passed through the studios of KUKU. A great spirit of comradeship existed among the station's employees. They loved their work and KUKU. They stayed at the studio late at night devising new ways of attracting sponsors, digging up live talent, writing irresistible copy, and keeping KUKU out of the red. Their un-falling warmth and good humor in the hectic days of prohibition and depression are recaptured in Jane Woodfin's sparkling description of her early radio days. This book is one for everyone to read and laugh out loud over.
