Phosphate Cuts Ammonia Fumes

A good way to reduce ammonia fumes in the laying house or broiler plant is to add small amounts of super phosphate to the litter or droppings, according to poultry experts at the University of Nebraska.

They explain that the super phosphate must be distributed evenly in small amounts to reduce the ammonia fumes. The fumes are reduced by fixing the nitrogen in the droppings. The litter also makes better fertilizer when its hauled out to fields or garden.

Sewage Disposal Planning Advised

Now is the time for farmers wanting a sewage disposal system to be making plans for it, according to Extension Engineer E. A. Olson of the University of Nebraska.

Plans for a septic tank and disposal field are contained in Extension Circular 703, available at the offices of county extension agents. Author Olson presents details on how a satisfactory system works.

He says that a cesspool as a means of disposing of sewage may pollute the water supply. At best, he says, its life is relatively short because the side walls become sealed with fats and greases. The septic tank separates liquid and solid sewage.

Many county agents, in addition to the extension circular, have portable forms for a concrete septic tank. The forms may be rented for a small cost.
