undistinguished members of that body.

Said the Lincoln:

"Once again, as when he rejected the effort of the Butler people to side track him into the race for Third district congress, Val Peterson has shown an inclination to act on the belief that in politics, as otherwise, a straight line is the shortest distance between two points."

"The governor can beat Butler. . . for Nebraskans are smart enough, surely to see that it is an imposition to ask them to settle for anything less than the full and energetic representation in Washington in the six man-killing years ahead."

Relaxed

The governor's announcement provoked a sigh of relief from Griswold supporters in the Statehouse. Many persons holding positions in Peterson's administration and who are also friendly to the former governor had been trying to figure out just which way to jump. Now they could relax.

Griswold, himself, said, "I appreciate that Governor Peterson had filed against me. . . would have been an active and vigorous opponent. However, I anticipate that I will have some opposition and I expect to make an active and aggressive campaign."

Senator Butler told Washington reporters, the governor's decision, "makes no difference."

Statement

Quotations from Peterson's statement, announcing his decision:

"The people of Nebraska owe neither Senator Butler nor me a thing. We have both been highly honored. I have been elected governor six times and am starting my sixth year in that office. Senator Butler has twice been elected to the U. S. Senate and is now in his 12th year. The question is which man can do the best job for the people in the six-year term which starts in January 1953. I believe I can."

"The action of the congress of the United States in the next few years will be tremendously important. In foreign affairs it will decide whether America will demand and restore respect for American citizenship and the American flag, or whether it will continue a servile and humiliating course of appeasement toward our open enemy and toward our pretended friends."

"In domestic affairs it will decide whether the American system of free enterprise under which we became the most powerful nation on earth is to be continued, or whether it is to be artfully merged into the socialistic and, in the last analysis, communistic plan of totalitarianism."

"The rooting out of these ruinous and even traitorous pro-

These were other political developments:

William Ritchie, former Democratic state chairman, announced he would file for the short term in the U. S. senate and would campaign on an anti-Truman basis.

Lincoln Mayor Victor Anderson, former Le. Gov. Robert Crosby of North Platte and State Sen. Hugh Carson of Ord continued to press their campaigns for the G.O.P. nomination for governor. From there, it was difficult to assess their progress; only one thing appeared certain: they are the three hardest-working candidates in the state today.

Lincoln—Frederick Valdemar Erastus Peterson versus Hugh Albert Butler

"That's the ticket in the Republican primary contest for U. S. senator."

Governor Peterson recently spurned the "easy road to Washington" and announced he would stay in the ring with Senator Butler and battle the Omahan in his bid for a third, six-year term.

Thus, former Gov. Dwight Griswold, now a Gering banker, was left—for the time being, at least—without a primary opponent for the two years left of the late Sen. Kenneth S. Wherry's term. When the governor appointed Fred Seaton of Hastings to the interim term, the Hastings publisher said he would not be a candidate for re-election. . . .

Reaction

The first blush of reaction here in Lincoln was favorable to the governor's choice.

Editorialized the Lincoln Star: "After much soul-searching (the governor) picked the right road. He will seek the long term which means that he will contend with Hugh Butler, difficult though a campaign with Senator Butler may be. . . He started out on this senate business in the belief that he could do a better job of representing the people of Nebraska in Washington than Senator Butler, the latter completing a second term in office distinguished only by the fact that he was one of the
