Senator Butler's Strange Company

In the face of the surprise victory—surprising in its proportions rather than in the actual fact—accorded by the Senate to the proposal to put the Bureau of Internal Revenue under civil service, it is unlikely now that civil service, it is unlikely now that anything will interfere with its conanything will be supposed to the service of the surprise with a recommendation of the Hoover Commission.

mission.

A study of the vote is most revealing. Sen. Seaton voted for the proposal. Sen. Hugh Butler against it.

The junior Nebraska senator's reasoning followed the line so forcefully taken on the eye of the voting by his colleague from Maine, Sen. Margaret Chase Smith. Mrs. Smith was big enough to forget her general disapproval of the President in order to yote for a measure of his that would vote for a measure of his that would at least be a start, as she said, toward "preventing corrupt officials from picking the tax pockets of Ameri-
