HE BERMUDA CONFERENCE

President Dwight D. Eisenhower acted wisely in agreeing to the Bermuda Conference, since there is nothing to lose and something to gain in the meeting of American, British and French leaders. The meeting, moreover, comes at a time when U. S. foreign policy is being severely questioned abroad and when clarification of the issues and U.S. policy (and British and French policy) can do no harm.

We Americans sometimes fail to appreciate the fact that our foreign policy has often left much to be desired. Perhaps, this is the case because, in recent years, we have tended to be isolationist and, not until World War II, did this country take over the position and responsibility of the leading power of the world.

One does not have to look back far to recall the ineptness of our foreign policies between the World Wars. From an economic standpoint, this country was the primary culprit in a race of tariff hikes which set off a world wide frenzy of restrictive trade agreements, barter arrangements and unilateral trade pacts. Our policy also stimulated the development of the quota system, as used by France, prior to World War II, which strictly limited the amount of U.S. sales in countries limiting imports by the quota system. The U.S. trade policy finally resulted in forcing the British to abandon the free trade principle which they had championed for so many years and was one major cause of the tragic world depression.

In the realm of defense and foreign relations, the United States repeatedly blundered in the 1930's. One can recall how Congress refused to take the proper steps to safeguard our possessions in the Pacific in the thirties, how America refused to arm when danger signals were obvious in every corner of the world, and how we entered World War II almost completely unprepared-despite ample warnings and plenty of time in which to have mobilized defense resources.

Therefore, we see little to be lost in ne conference at Bermuda, where the leaders of the countries will be able to lay their cards quite frankly on the table. Those semi-isolationists in this country, some of them in Congress, who would refuse to associate with the United Nations, or with our allies, if we do not have our way one hundred per cent in certain vital fields, do themselves and their country little service by taking immovable positions. If one has allies, he must be ready to make some concessions to their point of view, and if this country is not willing to make anw concessions to its allies, we will not long enjoy such a relationship and may well find ourselves with no other choice but to "go-it-alone."

* * * EGULATING ELECTIONS

Senators Carl Hayden, Arizona Democrat, Robert C. Hendrickson, New Jersey Republican, and Thomas C. Hennings, Jr., Missouri Democrat, have introduced a bill which would raise the limitations on campaign spending and bring primaries and party conventions under certain Federal regulations.

The three Senators seem agreed that laws regulating Federal elections are currently inadequate to meet today's needs. While the bill might run into heavy opposition, that section dealing with raising the limitations on expenditures by candidates should meet general approval.

The bill would raise the limit of expenditures for national committees in Presidential races from $3,000,000 to $10,-000,000. Candidates for the Senate would be allowed to spend $50,000, rather than $25,000, and candidates for the House of
