Wood, Water Don't Mix Say Manufacturers

Wood and water don't mix! Everybody is familiar with the ring a damp glass leaves on a wet tabletop; water on a wood floor produces the same effect. Because water is the natural enemy of wood, flooring manufacturers devote much time and effort to protecting wood from water. An outdoor drying period of three to four months is followed by as much as two weeks in huge ovens which literally take the moisture out of the wood before it is made into flooring.

After these precautions to get the wood properly dried, some housewives persist in putting water back in the wood by scrubbing or mopping. This treatment will ruin the appearance of the floor and may cause serious warping, cracking and buckling that will end the floor's usefulness many years before it should be showing the slightest signs of wear.

For much the same reasons self-polishing waxes have no place in the care of hardwood floors. All waxes of this type are about 85 per cent water and should be used only on linoleum, asphalt and rubber tile and similar floor surfaces. Happily the cleaning and waxing method that is best for wood floors is easier and faster than less satisfactory methods. Professional floor men recommend cleaning wax which cleans and waxes at the same time. Completely waterless, it actually dries cleaner, more thoroughly than old-fashioned soap and water scrubbing. At the same time it leaves a rich, durable coat of fine waxes to give hardwood floors the deep lustre and protection they need.

For maximum beauty and protection hardwood floors should be cleaned and waxed at least three or four times a year, and dusted daily with a soft cloth or cotton mop.
