

Chief, Two Officers Quit Police Force Amid Hot Shouting

At one point in the wild talk Chappell told Meisinger, "I'll still be living in Plattsmouth and I'll get even with you."
Council members tried to bridge the gap between the mayor and officers but found it useless.
Most of the council members were surprised at the situation and as one of them said, "I thought the police were doing a fine job. After giving them a raise I thought we had taken care of for a while." Other members said they thought the police were doing a good job.
At the last official meeting, the council raised the maximum salary for officers to $285 and that of the chief to $310.

Plattsmouth Thursday night was left with but one policeman. He was Wayne Schneider, who joined the force about two weeks ago when Raymond Ham quit. Schneider reported for work Thursday night and carried the night job alone through the weekend. John Hobscheidt, who resigned from the force earlier this year, returned to take the day job. By Saturday, Meisinger had appointed him chief of police on a temporary basis.
Chappell and Winn announced following the meeting that they intended to get signers to a petition to oust Meisinger from the mayor post. But that hasn't materialized yet.
Meisinger told the Journal that he had seen the break coming for some time but that he had "kept it inside himself" and could understand how the council might be surprised when it did happen. He said he also understood how councilmen might believe the police were doing a good job, because in some respects they were.
"I know I'm hard to work for," Meisinger said, "because I'm particular and I want to do things as close to right as I can." Chappell and Winn said he was abusive about directing them.
Meisinger's term as Plattsmouth mayor has been full of antagonism between himself and the council earlier and now with the police force for which he is responsible. Since he took office on May 1, 1954, Meisinger changed the entire force of officers, with former chief Kenneth Dunlap leaving this spring. Now they are changed again.
Earlier press reports quoted Chappell as saying Meisinger thought more of the parking meters than catching drunken drivers. Meisinger said he merely told them to take care of Plattsmouth first, and if they saw a drunken driver coming through the city, to get him but not wait on the highway until one came along.

The complaints and charges by both the mayor and police were numerous and some council members thought too petty to cause such a fuss. But they could dig no greater cause out of the participants.
The council took no clear stand during the unofficial meeting and fracas.

Redecorating—
George Conis is putting a new floor in his shop. Biles Paint Store is doing the work. This morning found Frank and Dean Biles busy laying the base for the new floor, as the customers came carefully tiptoeing in.

Conventionites—
Albin Chovanec attended the Eagles Convention at Nebraska City Friday and Saturday. Howard Ruback and his wife are in Chicago attending the National Retail Grocers Association Convention.

New Location—
Mary May is moving her beauty shop to a new location. She will occupy the space vacated by American Loan Plan, in the Cass Drug Building.

Passing Scene—
The lady last Friday morning, who emerged from the dentists office and stood on the sidewalk with a mirror viewing her bicuspid. Don't know if she was admiring the filling or counting to see if Doc took out one too many.

A regular meeting of the Plattsmouth city council is scheduled for the council chambers at eight o'clock tonight, at the city hall.

ALL IN THE FAMILY
APPLETON, Wis. — Two sisters, Mrs. Joseph Van Nuland, of Appleton, and Mrs. Martin Van Nuland, of Kimberly, recently gave birth to daughters on the same day at St. Elizabeth hospital. Their husbands are brothers. In September, 1952, the sisters gave birth to sons 10 days apart.

The American Chemical Society, seeking an explanation for a drop in graduate chemists, found that a third of 3,808 high schools it surveyed offered no course in chemistry.

Integration Order Faces Host Of Problems in Local Picture

By STANLEY JAMES
Journal
Washington Correspondent
WASHINGTON, June 16 — The Supreme Court's order, directing Federal District courts to begin an integration process in schools where racial segregation has been practiced, sets the stage for one of the country's great social and constitutional undertakings.

The court has ruled on the matter of constitutionality. There can be no recourse in the who do not agree with the decision; the order will have to be obeyed or circumvented. Flagrant disregard of the order probably cannot stand up over the long term.

Though the court's order carries with it the implied threat of force to back it up, as do all court orders, the widespread use of punitive power will probably be avoided in the next few years. Some cases might arise where punitive powers are utilized, but lower courts will, in all probability, be patient in initial efforts to work out something in school systems to satisfy all.

The problem which is most difficult is to be found in communities where the vast majority, often of both races, prefer separate schools. As with prohibition, a law or a court order does not automatically make people change their minds.

And the real problem involved in the integration order is that in many, many communities the majority — the great majority — does not want integration, against strong majority sentiment, are likely to produce a most complicated problem for federal district judges.

In many other communities, the majority either is indifferent or prefers integration, and in these cases, integration will be soon accomplished. Generally speaking, if the white race is the heavy majority race, the problem is not as critical as where the white race is the minority race.

But whatever the proportions, the court has finally ruled on the method to be used in effecting integration. A great process is now beginning, in the schools and in the courts. No one can foresee the immediate results, but the problems are many indeed, at the outset.

Legislative SIDELIGHTS..

Should you be Tempted—
Many legislators returning home are going to experience the attitude from constituents, expressed or unexpressed: "What did you do about solving some of the real problems of state government?"

Maybe this is a good time for the legislator to reply: "What would you have done if you'd been down there?" But he won't. Let's take a look at what your legislator has had to contend with in Lincoln.

He's expected to read, study and know what's in between 500 and 600 bills. Some of these bills are simple and minor corrections of statutes, but the others are complicated pamphlets dealing with matters such as school finance; school district reorganization; road and highway financing; budgets for the University of Nebraska, the state normal schools, the board of control in regard to revenue from taxation to meet the budgets.

These bills come in every sort of guise, from the simple one-paragraph bill to the highly complicated volume of 75 to 100 pages and with their own in-built dictionaries of definition so that the Legislators know what they are talking about.

It isn't exactly a job loaded with fun. He's expected to entertain constituents when they come to Lincoln whether he's in the mood or not. Most important, he's expected to appropriate sufficient funds to operate government and maybe give a little extra service; but he's not supposed to hit taxpayers in the pocketbook with any increase in property taxes or new forms of taxation.

He would love to get letters from home during the session to tell him how you felt about issues, but when he needs advice most his constituents forget him. Then he comes home and you criticize him for getting nothing done.

Maybe the most surprising thing is that the legislature gets as much done as it does. As citizens and taxpayers we expect miracles, but any time any one of us thinks he can do a better job than the fellow who is your legislator now, I am certain he would gladly have you run for the job come the next election.
