Big Business vs. Little Business?

WASHINGTON — Far from being antagonistic as some persons believe, big business and small business actually need each other, according to the Chamber of Commerce of the United States—an organization which represents both.

There is even a tendency for big business to create small businesses, says the Chamber. Many big establishments are primary assemblers of the countless products of small concerns.

For example, more than half the total proceeds for sales of one of the "big three" auto makers last year went to some 21,000 independent suppliers, most of them small. A major electrical goods manufacturer has over 33,000 suppliers and subcontractors, many of whom, in turn, depend upon still other suppliers.

The same situation holds for many other large concerns—in a very real sense they are creators of business for the little fellows, the Chamber points out. This being so, there seems to be little basis for the belief that the days of little business are numbered. Rather, says the Chamber, the outlook is for its continued and prosperous existence.

Housing studies indicate that the nation needs about 1,500,000 new homes each year for the next five years in order to catch up with the demand, the Chamber of Commerce of the United States reports.

When a sign, "Colored — For Rent" went up on a Washington apartment house, employees of the Soviet Embassy in Washington began moving out. Of the total of thirteen Russian families living in the apartment, eleven moved out before July 1st and two others had given notice of intention to move.

Deputy State Engineer Henry Schlitt to whom the question was fired said improvements in Sarpy and Douglas county on State 50 are being held up until the location of the proposed interstate route across those counties can be determined.

Churches Rising In United States

WASHINGTON — Persons in other countries who have been persuaded that Americans generally are materialistic should note an inspiring trend—the constantly growing number of new churches, suggests the Chamber of Commerce of the United States.

This year, according to data reaching the Chamber, Americans invest $700 million in religious construction—an all-time record. Moreover, this often overlooked construction trend seems likely to continue, the Chamber reports.

For the next ten years, the outlook is for construction or substantial alterations of more than 70,000 churches and synagogues. In addition, there will be about 12,500 other religious projects, including parish houses, Sunday schools and similar buildings.
