Ramsey Quits
 The director of the State Aeronautics Department, James Ramsey, now is with the Federal Civil Defense organization. Ramsey resigned last week after eight and a half years in his $7,950-per year post.

The air chief was instrumental in development of Nebraska's airport program into one of the finer ones in the country. Ramsey said he left "with a great deal of regret. My interest still is in aviation and I hope to continue in that field."

The director said his greatest satisfaction during his term has been to see the general development of aviation in the state. Now, he said, Nebraska has more lighted airports than most other states and more beacon lights than any state.

Also, he said, Nebraska operates the only complete radio navigational-weather system in the nation. The state, he said, has attracted national attention with its hangar construction program. Under this, hangars are built at municipal airports by the state, then sold reasonably to cities.

And, Ramsey added, the state has developed more airports under the federal airport program than all states except two.
