Bible Comment: 'Members One Of Another' Is Christian Ideal

THE disciples, a comparatively small fellowship living in a hostile world, possessed all things in common. It was a matter altogether of voluntary action. There was no power forcing those who had possessions to sell them and put them into the common resources.
Their common faith and their common sufferings had drawn them together, and made possible such an experience. Their society was vastly different from ours, for they had no greed, no selfishness, no self-seeking. All were "members one of another," and each had his part in giving and receiving.
Such an ideal condition did not last long in the early church, true, for there began murmurings concerning the unjust distribution of common funds and the preference that was given for some over others.
It being the purpose of the early Christian church to do right, the apostles sought immediately to adjust this matter, but they themselves felt that their ministry was the ministry of the word of God. Therefore, they proposed to the disciples that responsible men be picked who could attend effectually and wisely to the economic adjustments within the church.
We are disposed to regard this as the original institution of deacons, and these who were chosen were ordained for their particular tasks by the laying on of the apostles' hands.
This spirit—of organizing the common resources of a group for the welfare of all—ought to be always prevalent in the church, and should represent the goal of our society and our nation.
