Ticklers By George

THE DRIVER'S SEAT

Tulare is one of California's 58 counties, and it is probably most famous for its Sequoia National Park. In the shadows of Mt. Whitney, the nation's highest mountain, Tulare county is an area of small cities, a few medium-sized towns, rural areas and many places of beauty. To the motorist, however, Tulare is of more significance. It has handled its highway problems with admirable common sense. Unlike most improvement problems, Tulare's did not cost millions of dollars a mile. It was not a thing to cause engineers to marvel. How had it been done? County road officials decided to look at some of the accident causes in Tulare and came up with solutions that could be accomplished now and were easy to pay for. Joe Garcia, Jr., Tulare road commissioner, says the road improvement program started four years ago. Logically, the officials began to study hazard markings of all kinds. They figured that, with many hazards inherent in existing roads, the only practical way to save lives right away was to give motorists plenty of warning of the hazards. So they began a detailed study of hazard markers and road signs. Tulare officials found that most of their signs and hazard markers were badly outdated and useless. Most of the signs, installed 20 years ago, were too small. The roads had been improved to permit faster traffic, but the signs still were adequate only for cars and trucks traveling about 30 miles an hour. Some of the hazard markers and signs were badly placed. Hidden behind trees or growths of shrubs, they couldn't be seen by motorists no matter how slowly they were traveling. Often curb signs were placed so close to curves that a driver going 50 miles an hour couldn't possibly slow down enough to take the curve safely. Many of the signs were not reflective so they could be seen at night. Put up during an era when there was little night driving, the signs served only to warn motorists driving during daylight hours. Other signs had been mutilated, vandalized or damaged by the elements. Tulare officials soon enough realized that it was possible to warn all motorists of hazards by adopting a comparatively inexpensive program of sign modernization. Tulare has not found a solution for motorists who choose to ignore the warnings, but acclaim from safety and highway authorities, and an apparent decline in accident rate, indicates the sign modernization program is a success. ## Traffic Cases In Police Court

Judge J. H. Graves had only traffic cases to occupy his time at the mid-week roundup this morning. Frank Pokorny was charged by Officer Lawrence Chappell with failure to bring his auto to a full stop at a school stop sign, also not having proper license plate. He received fines of $5 each of the counts and costs, total $14. Leonard Yates of Murray was before the court charged with careless driving, also damaging two culvert heads on Lincoln Avenue. He received fines and costs of $35.30. Chief of Police John Hobscheidt was arresting officer.
