Earth's Warming Up

Dr. Eward Teller says the earth is warming up. Taking his stand in the controversy concerning the trend of the weather, Teller says that the increasing amount of carbon dioxide in the air is warming up our earth.

Teller says accurate measurements show that there has been an increase of 2% in the carbon dioxide content in the air since the beginning of the industrial revolution. This has been caused by heavy uses of fuel such as coal, oil, and its derivatives.

Unless there is a halt to the trend, Teller believes the earth will become overheated before the end of the twentieth century. He believes that when the amount of carbon dioxide has increased much further, ice caps on the Poles will begin to melt (they are already receding) and the amount of water in the oceans will increase.

This will inundate such Port cities as New York and such countries as Holland. The answer? Teller believes the answer is the use of nuclear fuel. The Associate Director of the University of California's Radiation Laboratory says that we must put nuclear fuel to work, powering electrical plants which otherwise would consume coal, or oil or other carbon dioxide producing fuels.

Johnson says "business as usual" will not put a U. S. satellite in the skies and that not only must we accomplish this goal but we face the task of catching up with Russia in the satellite and rocket fields — where we — are not trailing ominously.

extent that, if possible, workers now experiencing lay-offs and those not having a full week's work should be considered first.
