Bible Comment: Baptism of Christ Set an Example For Sinful Mankind

WHEN John the Baptist came from the wilderness as the forerunner of Christ, immediately there were many who believed that in John the expected Messiah had come. But he was insistent in correcting that impression.

His baptism was baptism of water, signifying cleansing and repentance, but John said that there was one coming, mightier than himself, the latchet of whose shoe he was not worthy to loose, who would baptize them with the Holy Spirit and with fire.

It is strange that we inevitably picture John as an old man, living apart from men and renouncing the world. On the contrary, he was a very young man, on fire with passionate convictions, subjecting himself to rigid disciplines.

John left the wilderness that he might come into contact with men and society, persuading individuals to turn from sin, urging society to purge itself for the coming of the Redeemer.

To John, Christ Himself came to be baptized. John hesitated and would have refused, feeling his own unworthiness. But Christ was insistent. "Suffer it to be so now," He said, as Matthew tells us in his account of the baptism, "for in this it becometh us to fulfill all righteousness."

Why did Christ insist on public baptism? John had preached baptism as an outward sign of repentance and the beginning of a new life. But Christ had no sin to repent and in Him was the fullness of the new life He had come to give to men.

The baptism, however, was in harmony with the nature, meaning and purpose of Christ's coming. It marked His humanity, His willingness to share the life of sinful men that He might show the ways of God to them. This is the essence of the public baptism of Christ.
