Sinatra Big Hit In "The Joker Is Wild" At The Cass

In a Chicago hotel room during the brawling twenties, a promising young singer named Joe E. Lewis came to the end of a career, left for dead with his throat slashed by the hoodlums he had refused to kneel under to.

Brought back to life by a miracle, but with his singing voice almost gone, he doggedly started all over again, as a comic, and became one of the country's most successful, best-loved cafe performers. The scars he received in Chicago, however, were as much on his heart as on his throat, and the laughs he drew from audiences by poking fun at his own weakness for liquor, women and the horses were but the echo of the desperation and loneliness he felt in the middle of the happiest nightclub throng. Out of that search for forgetfulness has come one of show business' greatest talents and most moving and exciting stories.

The saga of that fantastic comeback and of the dramatic touching and uproarious private and public life of a man who lives up to every wisecrack he makes about himself has been filmed with Frank Sinatra starred in the lead role. Titled "The Joker Is Wild," the Charles Vidor VistaVision production, opening Sun., Mon., and Tues., March 16, 17 and 18, at the Cass Theatre, promises to be one of the year's outstanding films and a rare opportunity for moviegoers to enjoy Sinatra's Oscar-honored dramatic talents along with the singing and clowning that have made him the dean of entertainers.

Starring along with Sinatra are Mitzi Gaynor, in her first dramatic role, Jeanne Crain and Eddie Albert, with Beverly Garland and Jackie Coogan featured. A Paramount release, "The Joker Is Wild" was directed by Charles Vidor, produced by Samuel J. Briskin and written for the screen by Oscar Saul from the best-selling book by Art Cohn.
