Cupid Takes Pheasant Toll

LINCOLN — This is the time of year when cock pheasants pay little attention to anything except their automobiles. They will ignore your automobile, too, which means that April, May, and June, according to the Game Commission, are months of extremely high road kill. Hen pheasants are also victims of amorous propensities, though not quite so blindly intent as their male counterparts.

This highway pheasant kill is not, however, a total loss. For the Game Commission collects many of these birds, puts them in a freezer and later uses them for determining percentages of cocks and hens wounded by hunters. This information is then fitted into the over-all cock-hen-ratio picture. Highway killed birds, still wrapped in paper, are fluoroscoped. Shotgun pellets are instantly visible and the numbers of cocks and hens carrying such pellets noted.

The Game Commission points out that the cock-hen ratio is important in managing pheasants. Cocks may be heavily harvested without affecting the reproduction and hence the annual crop of birds, but heavy kills of hens may reduce a pheasant population. The fluoroscoping will take place in late June, when the Commission has collected sufficient birds.

TV COMMERCIAL SPOILED
TOKYO — The nightmare that haunts every producer of television food commercials happened at Radio Tokyo — a fly made an unscheduled guest appearance. The insect perched happily on an open can of salmon just as the camera focused on it and feasted royally for five seconds, the cameras transmitting its enjoyment to the viewing audience.

"Don't swing to the Left or Right," lecturer advises America, "the safest place is the middle of the road." The speaker must be unfamiliar with our automobile statistics. — Dallas News.
