Mother's Day Has Meaning

Somehow, Mother's Day is a little different from other holidays and special occasions. Christmas has a deep religious meaning, as has Easter.

But too many of us look upon Christmas merely as a time to get and give a lot of presents—as well as birthdays—and on Easter as a day for wearing new clothes or hunting a few hidden eggs.

Other holidays usually mean a day of freedom from work, a chance to eat a lot, or shoot off fireworks, or watch a parade, or to have some sort of celebration for our own special pleasure and enjoyment.

But on Mother's Day we are unselfish. We think of somebody other than ourselves. It is a day set aside to express to our mothers the love and honor and respect which we hold for them.

We do not decorate the house or march behind a band or hold a gay party. We simply give her flowers or some other gift, and try to make her realize in some small way what she means to us.

A reader tells us about an unusual example of business insight. In a remote section of the South the owner of a private ferry boat has posted a large sign at the dock. "Passengers must pay in advance as the boat leaks."

Margaret Albert of Omaha underwent surgery at the Clark-Hospital Thursday. She will have to remain at the hospital for some time yet. The patient is in room 437. Visiting her Saturday at the hospital were Mrs. Elizabeth Engekemeier, a sister, and a niece, Mrs. Glen Terryberry.
