A Successful Atlas

A fully-powered Atlas intercontinental ballistic missile has been fired by the Air Force. This is what the nation has been waiting to see for many years.

The culmination of thirteen months of effort was successfully brought off recently when a 100-ton, 3-engine rocket was fired from Cape Canaveral. The successful shot followed a failure, an effort to achieve the first firing of an honest-to-goodness ICBM on July 19th. On that occasion the Atlas blew up in the sky after being aloft only some seconds.

The significance of the Air Force's successful Atlas firing is great. It means that the United States is at least one giant step closer to perfection of an operational ICBM. The Russians have long since posted claims that they possess an operational ICBM. And in recent days an extensive series of rocket launching sites have been reported, and detected, in the Murmansk area. This is an area which provides the Russians with the shortest rocket route to U. S. targets.

There is no reason to believe that we are not still behind the Russians in our ICBM program, as we are undoubtedly behind them in our missile program. Our talk about shooting a satellite to the moon, and other such issues, is encouraging, and we may, indeed, be first in this effort, but the fact remains that the ICBM is the probable weapon of the future, and it is the most important immediate goal of our rocket and missile program.

For that reason the successful firing of an Atlas — designed to travel some six thousand miles or more — is a happy event in the U. S. rocket and missile program. It comes about thirteen months after the Air Force began its testing of the big Convair missile.

Down Memory Lane

20 YEARS AGO

Corn packing time has arrived at the Norfolk Packing Co., plant. The first shipments of the early corn are being received and canning is under way. The larger part of the crop is expected later — Robert J. Suhay and Glen John Applegate, New York bank robbers, slayer of a U. S. marshal in the postoffice at Topeka,

Kan., were hanged at the federal penitentiary at Leavenworth, Kan. The men were captured in Plattsmouth in 1937 when fleeing north from Topeka by Sheriff Homer Sylvester and Deputy Sheriff Cass Sylvester — Mr. and Mrs. W. G. Boedeker of Murray departed for a tour of Europe that will cover several months. They are to visit France, Switzerland, Germany and portions of Austria before returning. Their daughter, Miss Jane, will join them at Paris where she is studying music and accompany them on the trip. They expect to return in the early winter — The Cass county board of commissioners at their session set the levy for the year, it shows a reduction in the county but a slight increase for the state. The county is 3.92 mills and the state 2.88 mills making the total of 6.80 mills for the coming year — William E. Evers, son of Mr. and Mrs. W. F. Evers of this city, was the winner of one of the highest awards at the 1938 Citizens Military Training camp at Fort Crook. The young man received a gold medal for the best rifle shot in the regiment. The closing exercises of the camp were featured by a parade by the student battalion 600 participated in the event — In a survey of American Legion Junior baseball over the state, two Plattsmouth players were given recognition in the press, Stuart Sedlak, pitcher and Jimmie H. Jones, catcher of the local team,
