You And The Law

There Ought To Be A Law

No doubt, you've often said, when provoked, "There ought to be a law!" Well, maybe you are right, but we do have a few laws in the books already.

A law has been defined in a number of ways. Webster's dictionary has a whole column of definitions. In general a law is the binding custom or practice of a community; a rule or rules of conduct which are enforced by a controlling authority. This covers a lot of ground.

In Nebraska each person is subject to the laws of the United States and the laws of his own state. We have the laws enacted by our legislature and the laws which the courts have found to apply. We also have the laws or ordinances which have been adopted by our cities and villages.

Our State Constitution, for instance, consists of seventeen articles with approximately 195 sections. To this we can add the seven amendments which it appears were adopted at the recent election. The Revised Statutes of the State, which are the laws enacted by past Legislatures, consist of nine books ranging in size of from 800 to 1,800 pages and an additional volume which is an index.

Those laws cover most everything that can happen to a person from birth to death.

In addition, there are 166 volumes of the Nebraska Reports, which contain the opinions of the Nebraska Supreme Court from the early days of the state to the present. Each of these books contains approximately 800 pages. Thus, there is a lot of law in the books.

Enough? This does not include the laws passed by the United States Congress, many of which affect each of us personally. It does not include the interpretation of these laws by the United States Courts. Nor does it include the numerous rules adopted by the various administrative agencies, both state and federal. Nor does it include the various city and village ordinances.

Maybe there ought to be a law, but the chances are there already is one.
