Windbreak Can Make Winter's Chores Easier
LINCOLN — Nebraska blizzards have a way of reminding us that a good windbreak can eliminate large drifts around the farmstead where a farmer does most of his winter chores. "Farmers can solve this problem by planting trees in the right places," points out Ellsworth Benson, Extension forester at the College of Agriculture.

"Many existing windbreaks that are not protecting the farmstead can, with minor changes, perform this function. In many cases, one row of red cedar planted to the north and west of the present windbreak can help correct the situation. Such a row should be planted back far enough so as to trip the snow before it gets to the farmstead area."

"Evergreens will afford a great deal of protection from snow drifts just five years after planting," according to Benson. County Extension Agents over Nebraska are taking orders for various kinds of windbreak trees for planting this spring. Additional information on windbreaks also can be obtained from the local Soil Conservation Service or by writing to Ellsworth Benson, Extension forester, College of Agriculture, Lincoln.

Dairy Outlook Is Brighter
LINCOLN — In direct contrast to some segments of agriculture, the outlook for dairying in 1960 looks "relatively good."

For the second straight year, production declined slightly in 1959 while per capita consumption held about steady, reports T. A. Evans, Extension dairy marketing specialist at the College of Agriculture.

"An increase in total consumption due to increased population lowered dairy surpluses to the lowest level in several years. This closer balance between production and consumption should result in prices to dairy farmers in 1960 at least equal to those received in 1959 and very probably higher," Evans reports.

Early estimates indicate that Nebraska total milk production in 1959 declined about 3 per cent below 1958. The major portion of the decline appeared to be among the smaller producers in the farm-separated cream marketing areas of the state.

Butter production in 1959 declined about 8 per cent below 1958 output. However, production of Grade A milk marketed through the Nebraska-Iowa Milk Association increased about 8 per cent.

"Due to the decline in beef cattle prices in 1959, it is likely that milk and cream producers will not cull their herds in 1960 as heavily as they did during the past two years," Evans predicts. "This will mean that production of milk in the cream producing areas of Nebraska probably will level off in 1960. An increase in cream production is possible, depending largely on weather and crop conditions. Production of Grade A milk should continue to increase in 1960."

Ice Traps Duck
Asheville, N. C. — When a duck sleeping in a lake awoke recently, he found that his tail feathers were frozen in ice.

By mid-afternoon, word of the duck's plight brought crowds, a traffic jam around city-owned Beaver Lake, and the Fire Department. The duck's dilemma was solved by Harry A. Guter, who used a Fire Department grappling hook to haul himself in a small skiff across the 100 yards of ice to the grounded fowl. The duck was transferred to the open waters of a lake.
