When a physician prescribes medication he takes into consideration many of his patient's individualities such as age, weight, blood pressure and health history. It stands to reason, therefore, that prescriptions for the same medicine can vary in strength and dosage for different persons. It is foolish and can be harmful to "try" a prescription that was prepared for someone else. When you feel below par, see your doctor and obtain the "personalized" treatment that will quickly restore you to good health.
