

Hunting a Better Crop? Don't Hide Your Head Like Ostrich

Cass County farmers: how about the ostrich for a good, cash crop?

During a normal spring, it might be something to talk about, according to a comment made at the Rotary Club luncheon Tuesday noon at the Lions Building.

Carl Ganz, former Cass County banker now of Lincoln, was at the meeting to show color slides and tell about a trip to Africa last June.

During his presentation, he told of a visit to an African ostrich farm.

Have these farmers got it made? Have a look.

The farm had about 250 ostriches. They feed on alfalfa and other pasture, bugs and whatever else they can forage.

The farmer harvests a crop of feathers, for which there is a continuing market, every six months from the time the ostrich matures for about the next 15 years of the ostrich's life.

Then, when feather production begins to get skimpy, the birds are paired off for breeding and they then produce little ostriches, batch after batch, until they are about 50 or 60 years old. All you'd need would be some longies that'd fit an ostrich, and you could go into business in Cass County.

The Lincoln banker commented that there is never a divorce or remarriage problem among ostriches. They mate just one, for life. When a mate dies, the other half of the couple is sure to follow in a short time.

Ganz showed photo slides of all the main stops and points of interest along the 30,000-mile tour he and Mrs. Ganz took from Lincoln, through Africa and back to Lincoln again.

He was introduced by Orville Julian, program chairman for the day.
