Ike on Red Aims

President Eisenhower said recently he was convinced Russia wants to negotiate a ban on nuclear weapons tests. The President also said he thought the Russians wanted to reach an agreement on general disarmament.

This is an important statement, for it puts the U. S. government on record as believing that the Russians are sincerely interested in banning nuclear tests and disarmament. If it proves to be an accurate estimation, it can have a profound effect on world development and on the economy of many countries.

The United States is currently spending more than half its budget—estimated at about forty-four billion dollars, on defense and foreign aid. Some of the foreign aid, of course, is military aid.

The President was hopeful that the Russians might agree to a nuclear test ban proposal which he and British Prime Minister Harold Macmillan worked out during a meeting at Camp David, Maryland, recently.

Mr. Eisenhower said he was eager to reach some sort of agreement before other nations obtain nuclear weapons, because of the prospect that as more nations acquired these weapons the difficulties of banning test and controlling nuclear weapons will become more and more difficult.

In addition, Eisenhower said that the Russians have made concessions recently, in an effort to reach an agreement, and called this promising.

Although there are indications that months of hard bargaining lie ahead, even after the United States and Britain presented their new formula for banning nuclear tests, the President's statement is encouraging, and if the three major nuclear powers reach agreement on banning weapons and disarmament, it will be a refreshing and profound development for the people of the world. It could be termed the great hope of 1960, and certainly every effort should be made by this government to reach a satisfactory agreement which might prevent a worldwide catastrophe on a scale which the human mind cannot even comprehend.

Down Memory Lane

20 YEARS AGO
 Visitors to the city have been attracted by the extensive display of whiskers of various hues and style worn by the men residents. This is not a part of Golden Spike days, but started as an advertising stunt by the BREX shopmen to boo their dance. The idea spread and all the men in the community, young and old have taken up the fad—The University of Nebraska paid honor to the students in the upper ten of their classes.
