Modernization Will Help Ag Lab Serve Farmers

LINCOLN — Modernization and remodeling of facilities of the Department of Veterinary Science at the University of Nebraska will enable the staff to be of greater service to Nebraska livestock producers.

This statement comes from Dr. O. D. Grace, who is in charge of the diagnostic laboratory within the veterinary science (formerly animal pathology) department on the College of Agriculture campus.

The current modernization program will make the diagnostic facilities on the agricultural college campus among the finest available in the Midwest, Dr. Grace commented.

"Diagnostic work will be improved in quality and increased in volume," he continued.

The diagnostic laboratory fulfills a need of practicing veterinarians in the state for laboratory examinations which assist in making a diagnosis of animal illnesses. Such diagnosis in the field are difficult because of the expense of laboratory equipment and the time-consuming procedures required.

Correct diagnosis is just as essential in animals as in cases of human illness, Dr. Grace stressed. Many different diseases present the same or very similar sets of symptoms.

A practicing veterinarian, with broad medical training in such subjects as anatomy, physiology, pathology, and bacteriology, is able to examine herds and flocks under their usual environment and select typical animals or materials for laboratory processing.

After properly packing them for shipment, he prepares a letter containing a complete history to accompany the specimen.

On arrival of the package at the diagnostic laboratory, the history is studied to determine what laboratory procedures should be conducted.

These procedures may involve a simple microscopic examination; culturing to determine the types of bacteria present, or the inoculation of laboratory animals or tissue cultures.

The modernization program has permitted the addition of some new equipment for newly-developed diagnostic techniques. One such technique is the use of fluorescent antibodies to diagnose rabies, a disease carried by animals that is fatal when contracted by man.
