Russia Wins again

It was no surprise that Russia walked off with top honors at the 1960 Olympic Games. The United States, which has traditionally dominated the track and field events, came up with its weakest showing in track and field in a number of years. Although in both men and women's track, we won twelve gold medals to Russia's eleven, this was a disappointment. As usual, the Russians were so much stronger than the United States in men's and women's gymnastics shooting, and weight-lifting, that a U. S. victory in total points was impossible. Nevertheless, in summary, the United States did well in the Olympics, finishing second, and it is interesting and significant that the two leading nations in the Olympics for the last decade have been the United States and Russia.

The lesson to be learned in the 1960 Olympics, and in the 1956 Olympics, is that the United States must send to these international sports events a better-balanced team, with capable performers in the weight-lifting, shooting and gymnastic events. The nation's schools and colleges could do a lot to better our Olympic effort if it is found that such sports should be made a part of the athletic program in this country.
