Ag Plan: Tool Up for Food Need, Let Farmer Profit, Too

SIDNEY — Dean E. F. Frolik of the Nebraska College of Agriculture Friday urged for serious consideration of the "twin problems of agriculture which are virtual opposites."

Tooling up to meet increasing demand for food as the result of a rapidly increasing world population;

The plight of the farmer today as he copes with surplus production and a disproportionately small share of the nation's income.

Dr. Frolik spoke at the joint annual convention of the Nebraska Irrigation Association and the Nebraska Reclamation Association here.

"We have and are helping the farmer to do a wonderful job for the consumer," he continued. "Let us at the same time give some attention to trying to find means of more nearly equitably rewarding the farmer for his splendid contribution."

"In the last 20 years, productivity of workers in manufacturing trades and services has increased about 50 per cent. But during the same period, productivity per man hour of farm workers has increased by 134 per cent or more than 2½ times that in industry, trades and services."

"While this splendid record on the farm has benefited the general economy through constantly more and better food at lower prices, the farmer has not shared financially in this progress. In fact, average per capita net income of farm people at present is little more than half of that of nonfarm people. This hardly seems just reward for the most efficient of all segments of our entire economy Dr. Frolik asserted.

"We at the College of Agriculture are taking positive steps, in addition to our regular program of many years' duration, which may be of some help in solving these problems. These steps include:

Significantly increased emphasis on education in agricultural policy which should help in crystallizing thinking on farm problems and legislation.
 Cooperation in attempting to bring industry to Nebraska, particularly agriculturally-oriented industry.
 Increasing emphasis on research and education in food utilization.
 Increasing research on industrial utilization of farm product.

Attempting to put our research on a larger field basis, so that we can develop more efficient operations for farms which are constantly growing larger.
 Concerning ourselves more and more with quality of farm products rather than merely quantity.

Attempting to develop the use of farm crops with higher returns per acre — such as commercial vegetable crops. These also, of course, result in more industry.
 Doing research and education on optimum practices to reduce costs—considerable farm loss in income is due to over-irrigating
