LETTERBOX

To The Editor: We feel, kind friends, like writing a few lines in regard to the incident by gun point which occurred in our little neighborhood city Nehawka. Was certainly, a low-down trick pulled on our friend Ray Pollard.

We and others who came here to make our home feel, we'd be unsafe to go to bed for fear of a gun point episode.

We certainly feel unhappy, about the deal far from a neighborly act. We moved here some years ago — but this was a let-down.

Very Sincerely, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Thiele, Plattsmouth.

Many farm ponds and slow-moving streams this summer may be harboring a $100 million threat to cattle and swine and a potent hazard to human health, too.

The threat is the disease known as leptospirosis—"lepto" for short. It is now costing cattle raisers an estimated $12,000,000 a year in losses. Swine producers are experiencing heavy losses also.

Why are ponds and slow moving streams such key factors in spreading this disease? The answer is that "spreader" animals which have leptospirosis organisms in their systems "shed"

Cattle often pick up leptospirosis in ponds or slow-moving streams.

This is why authorities urge farmers to bar off such water sources to prevent their contamination by carrier animals. Farmers should also note that leptospirosis can be spread by body contact, too.

One of the big problems about leptospirosis is that it may look like several other diseases. So, livestock owners should become aware of some of its symptoms so that at the first warning signs a veterinarian can check and advise.

In cattle, "lepto" occurs in both the "mild" and the "severe" form. The mild form causes cows to lose their calves and to show loss of appetite, difficult breathing, reduced milk flow, or milk may be thickened. Sometimes urine is tinged dark brown. The severe form also causes loss of calves, scouring and jaundice. . . . and in calves it causes stunting and chronic ill health.

Fortunately, leptospirosis can be prevented both in susceptible cattle and hogs by vaccination. The proper time for vaccination should be left up to the veterinarian, after he has examined the animals. Vaccination is a wise precaution in any area where this disease has been a problem.

Other preventive steps include protecting feed and watering facilities, keeping livestock out of damp, low pastures, and having replacement stock blood-tested.

Gas Tax Refund Forms Can Be Completed Now

LINCOLN — Farm operators who have not received their 1961 Federal Gas Tax refund claim forms should obtain them through their County Extension Office or from the Internal Revenue Service, advises Ted Nelson Extension Farm Economist at the University of Nebraska.

Form 2240 has been mailed to all farm operators of record who claimed the federal refund last year. Those who have not filed formerly must, however, obtain the forms for themselves. The 4 cents per gallon tax is collected for the purpose of highway construction and maintenance on all gasoline sold. This tax is therefore not due on gasoline used off of roads and highways for agricultural purposes but cannot be refunded unless the farm operator files a claim between July 1 and October 2.

Some farmers have not realized the refund in the past, not realizing that the form is extremely convenient and requires only a few minutes time. The refund amounts to a saving of about 10 per cent of the fuel cost for farmers using gasoline as a major source of power.

The farm management specialist also emphasized that Nebraska State Gas Tax Refunds are paid only on gasoline purchased in the last seven months before a claim is filed. Those who have not filed their first 1961 claim should do so prior to July 30 to avoid losing the refund on gasoline purchased in January. For the state refund, farmers having permits are allowed to file up to four claims per year.

Farmers using gasoline as a major fuel who do not claim either refund are in practice paying 60 to 70 per cent more in fuel cost than their neighbors who go to a small amount of inconvenience to claim the refunds due them, Nelson points out.
