Fight against 'Shatter Cane' Planned

LINCOLN—A co-operative program aimed at finding ways of controlling shatter cane — a pesky, annual weed — in Nebraska, was outlined and agreed upon at a special meeting here Saturday.

More than 60 persons, including farmers, irrigation district representatives, state and federal agencies and chemical company representatives, attended the meeting on shatter cane, which is a problem in the southeastern two-fifths of the state. The weed caused losses as high as $63.08 per acre through reduction of corn yields in some southern Nebraska fields last year.

The meeting grew out of a discussion last month at Norfolk when representatives of the Bostwick and Frenchman-Cambridge Irrigation Districts called upon the University of Nebraska to initiate steps to find a satisfactory means of controlling shatter cane.

Although a definite research and educational program designed to control shatter cane will be pushed in 1962, a University official stressed that the shatter cane problem will not be solved overnight because of its peculiar characteristics of dormancy and longevity.

"In the final analysis," according to Dr. Donald G. Hanway, "the individual farmer must get the job done. We can't expect miracles."

The chairman of the University's Department of Agronomy said "a long, well-planned program involving joint efforts of every person involved, through education and research, can help us master this problem."

The 1962 program will include: —Field tests in co-operation with farmers and various other groups involving use of the tillage system of corn production alone; till-plant system with an application of Eptam at lay-by time on corn; and conventional tillage with applications of Eptam 10 to 14 days prior to planting corn.

—Laboratory studies at the College of Agriculture on the seed of shatter cane as well as screening of various chemicals which might control the weed.

Representatives of the Bostwick and Frenchman-Cambridge Irrigation Districts, as well as farmers over South Central Nebraska, pledged support in the form of land and equipment to carry out the field tests. It was agreed that the program would be set up with arrangements with individual farmers to be coordinated by county Extension agents.

State Senator Kenneth Bowen of Red Cloud said he recognized that shatter cane is a major problem and that "it will be with us for some time."

John Furrer, University Extension agronomist, reported results of a recent survey of county agents which indicated that 90,000 acres of corn and 30,000 acres of sorghum were infested with shatter cane this year, primarily in South Central and southeastern Nebraska. Small acreages of soybeans and sugar beets also were infested.

Delbert E. Lane, University Extension agricultural engineer, said that the till-plant system of corn and sorghum production may be one way of controlling shatter cane by cultural means. Under this system, the crop is planted in the old row. Surplus soil, along with weed seeds and crop residues from the old ridge, is moved to the center where any resulting weeds can be controlled easily by cultivation.

Since the soil is not plowed, seeds of shatter cane and other weeds are kept near the surface where they may be controlled more readily.

Dr. Orvin Burnide, assistant professor of agronomy at the University, said he has initiated studies on the dormancy of shatter cane seeds. Samples were collected from the Republican River valley and elsewhere in 1961. Buried seed studies are being set up in Lincoln, North Platte, and Alliance. Seed viability studies under different storage conditions and conditions necessary for germination also are being initiated. In addition, Dr. Burnside plans to screen various pre-emergence chemicals on the control of shatter cane.

Herbert Day, technical sales manager, Stauffer Chemical Co., Omaha, reported excellent control of shatter cane with applications of the chemical Eptam in 12 trials conducted in the Bloomington, Bartley, Cambridge and Hastings areas this year. Three pounds of the chemical were applied to a prepared seedbed and immediately diked under. Applications were made one to 14 days prior to corn planting.

He reported that farmers in Illinois and Indiana have used Eptam for cane control. They found that some corn injury may occur, but it will be less than the competition from cane. Because of the cost of $10.50 per acre for a broadcast treatment and chances of injury, this method of chemical application is justified only on severely-infested fields.

Furrer said that Eptam cannot be used on sorghum as it will kill the sorghum plant just as it does the shatter cane plant.

Clothing Construction Workshop

By MRS. KAY LEIDING
Extension Home Agent

How about having a clothing construction workshop in your living room this winter?

The Extension Clothing Specialists, Gerda Peterson and Anna Mair Kreifels are starting a television series this week, "Clothes Become You".

The series is viewed on KOLN TV every Tuesday morning from 9:30 to 10, beginning Jan. 9.

The first program featured personal appearance and the emotional impact of clothing selection. The succeeding weeks will include information on equipment selection, sewing machine satisfaction and adjustment, fabric and pattern selection, construction, fitting and accessorizing.

The programs are outlined so that it will be possible to make a shirt-waist dress step-by-step with the specialists each week.

A calendar outlining each of these programs is being sent to 4-H Clothing leaders and Home Extension Club Presidents. If you will not receive an outline through one of these mailing lists please drop me a card and I'll be happy to forward a schedule to you.
