Extra Corn Is The Profit Corn

More bushels per acre is the aim of most corn producers. Growers find that those extra bushels are the profit bushels. When yields are just average, corn returns are used up paying for seed, fertilizer, labor, equipment and other corn production costs. One of the most effective ways of boosting yields is weed control with today's modern herbicides.

Since weeds and corn compete for nutrients and water, getting rid of the weeds assures that all plant food and moisture go into corn. Some of the herbicides most widely used are Atrazine and Simazine which control both the broadleaf weeds and grasses for the full growing season. On acre after acre where these weed killers have been used, corn yield and profits have increased.

Today's herbicides appear to be one of agriculture's biggest bargains, since effective chemical weed control costs only 1 1/2¢ equivalent of a few bushels of corn per acre, and is paid for many times over by extra yields. These chemicals pave the way to extra corn from each acre, and those extra profit bushels which bring the greatest net return. A free booklet on weed control in corn may be obtained by writing to Geigy Agricultural Chemicals, Department WN, Saw Mill River Road, Ardsley, New York.
