'Fairy Ring' Disease Hits Some Lawns

LINCOLN—Lawns that are dying out in spots and have dense white moss on the crowns and below the soil are probably affected by fairy ring disease, according to John L. Wehling, Extension plant pathologist at the University of Nebraska.

The disease is caused by several soil-inhabiting mushroom types of fungi which begin their growth with the germinating spore or seed, Wehling said.

"Filaments of the fungus grow outward equally in all directions, permeating the soil and acting as a non-wetting cotton," the plant pathologist explained.

"It is almost impossible to wet soil which is filled with this fungus," the University plant disease specialist said. "As a result, the grass growing on such soil will wither and die due to lack of moisture."

Fairy ring is difficult to control because of the impenetrable characteristic of the affected soil to any fungicidal treatment.

"Prior to making an application to control fungicide, break up or perforate the fairy ring soil with a spade or similar tool," he advised.

According to Wehling, a fungicide containing mercury is sold commercially in Nebraska and has given best results in fairy ring.

According to Wehling, the fungus continues to grow outward at a rate of a "few inches to two feet or more per year."

"The fungus on the inner side will die out and eventually a circle of dead grass will appear. Ironically enough, the grass on the inside of the circle usually will be a darker green because the dead fungus enriches the soil with organic matter that can be utilized by grass roots," he explained.
