Are You Sure Is Was a Gizzard Shad?

LINCOLN — Fish have more names than almost any other living creature, or so it seems. Nearly every fish has a few misnomers attached to it, according to fisheries personnel of the Game Commission.

Dunbar (12)

Four of the most frequently misnamed fish in Nebraska are the quillback, blue catfish, gizzard shad, and flathead catfish. There are few quillbacks in the state, but people often call the river carp sucker and plains carp sucker by that name.

Blue catfish, also a rarity in Nebraska except for the Missouri River, are often called white or silver catfish. Most of the so-called blue catfish taken from lakes and streams other than the Missouri are actually large channel catfish with a bluish color.

Flathead catfish is locally known as the mud, yellow, willow, or appaloosa catfish.

The gizzard shad also goes by the name of skipjack and hickory shad. Goldeye are often confused with shad because of taxonomic similarities.

Largemouth and smallmouth bass are generally mislabeled "black bass." Although these two species are properly named "bass," they belong to the sunfish family. The white bass and the recently introduced striped bass are members of the true bass family.

Some of the colloquial names for the various fishes found in Nebraska are paddlefish (sponbill or spoonbill catfish); northern pike (northern or pike); grass pickerel (grass pike); carp (German carp, leatherback, or mirror carp); white sucker (common sucker); stone cat (stone roller).

Burbot (freshwater cod, ling eel pout, or pocket eel); green sunfish (sun perch or sunfish); bluegill (sun perch or sunfish); sauger (sand pike); walleye (pike, walleyed pike, pickerel or dory); bowfin (dogfish or grindle); and freshwater drum (drum, sheephead, or croaker).

Although large dams are being constructed to facilitate irrigation, Huribut noted that the water table is only 2 to 6 feet below the soil surface in some areas. Farmers in such areas raise the water with a water wheel equipped with little scoops. As the wheel revolves, scoops pick up water which runs down the spokes and into a nearby ditch. The water wheels are powered by oxen.

Mr. and Mrs. Raymond Freeman and children were Tuesday overnight and Wednesday guests of Mr. and Mrs. Clarence King and family of Valley.

It's unbelievable to see how much hand labor goes into crop production," Huribut said. "Although most of the tillage operations are carried out with oxen, they are interested in mechanized agriculture. At present, they are trying to organize central tractor machinery services for custom work. However, it will be difficult to move mechanized equipment because there are no rural roads. Transportation is limited mostly to oxen and camels."

Further Farm Consolidation Is Forecast

LINCOLN — A University of Nebraska agricultural economist says that future economic growth in the western Corn Belt will be characterized by:

—Further adjustments in farm consolidation;

—Expansion in agribusinesses which serve agriculture;

—Limited non-farm industrial development.

Dr. Howard Ottosen, chairman of the Department of Agricultural Economics at the University, made these comments in a speech to members of the Farm Credit Board of Omaha meeting at the Nebraska Center.

"We are going to see continued consolidation of farms and much more in the way of capital and land per worker in agriculture," Dr. Ottosen said.

"With the rapid growth taking place in the western U.S., we are undoubtedly going to see an increase in the agricultural industry, particularly in the field of agribusiness composed of businesses that service agriculture."

"One of the chief increases may be in the field of cattle feeding. Instead of exporting feed and livestock, more of our feed will be fed to livestock and the resulting animal products will be processed in this area before shipment to other parts of the nation."

"There will be some limited non-farm industrial activity mainly in the large urban centers like Omaha, Lincoln and Denver, as well as other medium size farm cities. People in small towns often do not realize how difficult it is to attract and develop new industries," Dr. Ottosen said.

Grouse Increase

LINCOLN — Grouse populations in Nebraska continue to rise, according to the Game Commission's recently completed 1962 spring counts.

Prairie chicken populations are up 34 per cent and sharp-tails increased 20 per cent over 1961. Compared to the average for the past five years, prairie chickens are up 25 per cent sharp-tails 32 per cent, and both species show a combined increase of 29 per cent. The censuses were conducted on 19 routes in the primary grouse range.

Progress

"George Washington could broadjump 23 feet, a record in those days." Today we have politicians who can sidestep farther than that.

KNEE HIGH! — This picture was taken on the 4th of July when corn traditionally is supposed to be knee high. Howard Wiles posed on his farm south of Plattsmouth with Eddy Johnson of Plattsmouth. Wiles and son Emerson have 500 acres in corn, some of which is in tassel and some is already silking. Wiles and Son feed all their corn to cattle and this year, even with a good crop, will have to buy some corn for their feeding operations.
