Latex Sprays Can Cut Needle Drop from Trees

LINCOLN — Have you had trouble with spruce trees losing their needles before the Christmas season? If so, this need not be a problem. Scientists have proved that latex-based sprays are effective in preventing needle drop from spruce trees, says Karl Loerch, University of Nebraska Extension forester.

"Fir and pine trees do not present the problem of needle drop as they naturally retain needles well," Loerch points out.

In an Ohio test, spruce trees were covered with a latex-based spray. The trees were kept for a week out of doors and then put into a warm room. They were tested 4 days and 7 days later, respectively, by dropping 18 inches onto a table top. Results show that the unsprayed trees had lost all their needles after 11 days. The latex-sprayed trees had lost very few needles by the end of the test.

"The increased needle retention on trees sprayed with latex seemed to result from two factors," Loerch reports. "In the first place, needles on the sprayed trees contained twice as much moisture as those on the unsprayed trees. Secondly, the latex seemed to form a continuous film over the needles gluing each needle in place."
