

No Favorites: Anyone Who Earns $600 Files Tax Return

LINCOLN — If you earned $600 or more during your tax year and you are a United States citizen or resident, you must file a federal income tax return even if no tax is due. This also applies to minor children.

There is one exception — if you are 65 or more years old at the end of your tax year, you do not have to file a return unless your gross income is $1,200 or more.

any return or document — income tax, estimated tax, self-employment tax, etc. — filed with the Internal Revenue Service. There is a $5 penalty for each failure to include this number unless reasonable cause can be shown for not including it.

On joint returns, use the social security number of the wage earner. If both husband and wife earn, use both numbers.

If at least two-thirds of your gross income is from farming and your tax year starts Jan. 1, you may choose from two filing dates. You may either:

1. File and pay the estimate of your tax by Jan. 15, 1963, then file your return and pay any balance by April 15; OR,
2. File your return and pay the full tax by Feb. 15, 1963.

If you report on the fiscal year basis (if your business year does not start Jan. 1) you may file your return and pay the tax by the 15th of the second month after the close of your fiscal year. Or, you may file an estimate within 15 days and a return within 3 1/2 months after the end of your fiscal year.

'Brucellosis Control Needed for Free Movement of Feeder Cattle in State'

LINCOLN — Free movement of feeder cattle in and out of Nebraska may be threatened if ranchers in the State fail to carry out a brucellosis control program.

This warning was sounded by Dr. E. Crosby Howe, Extension animals hygienist at the University of Nebraska, who explained that Nebraska is lagging behind other states in the brucellosis eradication. However, several changes in the program should make it easier for our ranchers to establish their counties as modified certified.

"States which are moving ahead in brucellosis control, have indicated that they may place an embargo on Nebraska feeder cattle. If so, cattle involved would have to be blood tested before entering another state," said Dr. Howe.

"Although the brucellosis control program is voluntary, it behooves every producer of feeder cattle to take part in the program if he expects to sell feeder cattle," Howe said.

In view of requests made by Nebraska ranchers and farmers, the brucellosis program has been altered to permit easier qualification of counties as modified certified brucellosis areas. The changes place increased recognition and status for official vaccination of calves and a minimum of blood testing on the ranch.

Here are the two basic requirements:

1. Over the three year period during which the certifying process takes place at least 80% of the replacement heifer calves in the county must be officially vaccinated.
2. All cows three years-of-age or older would be backtagged when passing through marketing channels.

In breaking these two points down, the rancher would request official vaccination at State-Federal expense or could pay for it himself if he wished. This vaccination would be done by the veterinarian of the livestock owner's choice.

The back tag program (also called the Market Cattle Testing program) works this way:

A tag having a number which codes the state, county, and herd of origin is glued on cows three years old or over as they pass through the livestock market. When the cow with the back tag is slaughtered a blood sample is taken and tested at the nearest laboratory.

A back-tagged cow destined for the feedlot could be tested in the usual manner at the auction market and results credited to the herd. The testing would be at no cost to the owner. The result is forwarded to the state where the cow was sold.

The tests will be credited to the herd and county of origin. If, at the end of a three-year period it can be shown that at least 15 per cent of the cows
