ALLEY VACATED

NO ORDINANCE

"Castro is learning that the path on which he has embarked has no future for himself or the Cuban people, except the future of increasing misery and frustration."

But on some unseasonably warm winter day the housewife may suddenly find an infestation of clover mites numbering in the hundreds of thousands. When they become a household pest, the pesky mite isn't trying to enter the home — but is trying to escape.

Any attempt to sweep, brush or otherwise remove them ends up with countless ugly red stains from crushing them.

These pinpoint-sized nuisances are presenting first-class biological mysteries to entomologists. Their sudden and widespread increase in numbers reported in recent years is puzzling. So is the fact that all of them are females.

Clover mites have long been known both here and abroad as pests which occasionally emerge from lawns and weeds to enter homes. Occasional infestations were normally springtime phenomena. Then mites began to appear in homes all over the country at any time of the year.

Some scientists believe that our better lawns, obtained through higher fertilization, have bred new mite generations in greater numbers and with greater vitality. Lush, green lawns are natural food, although they attack alfalfa and sometimes even fruit trees.

Lawns that come right up to the foundations of a home procure by keeping a base strip of soil around the home.

To avoid red stains from conventional clean-up methods, use a vacuum cleaner to pick them up without crushing them.

vide a natural pathway for mites. Driven by a cold snap, they seek warmth and literally swarm through small cracks into a house. On warm days, they answer for mites, for once they are in the house they will be nuisances until spring. Chem-
