'ROGUE' RYE
Nebraska wheat growers who expect to use wheat harvested from their own fields for seed purposes should remove any rye plants which may be present, a University of Nebraska crops specialist advised this week.

16 Countyans Among 1,080 U of N Grads

The meeting is scheduled for 6:30 p. m. Specialists from the College of Agriculture will be on hand to discuss the fertilizer tests and variety demonstrations. Fifteen different wheat varieties are included.

Other wheat producers may prefer to obtain pure, certified seed of an improved variety and plant it on clean ground for harvest in 1964, he commented.

It's Big Week For Plattsmouth

It's going to be a big week in Plattsmouth this week. With the co-incidence of Kiddies Day and the annual Jaycee Carnival starting Thursday there's sure to be entertainment aplenty for everyone.

More than 6,000 spectators attended the ceremonies at the Coliseum in Lincoln.

Graduating "with high distinction" were Larry M. Hammer of Greenwood, B. S. in Agriculture, and David A. Lindsey, Nehawka, B. S. from the College of Arts and Sciences; and "with distinction," Maribelle Elliott, Weeping Water, B. S. in Education.

the job because rye is headed out and stands well above the level of the wheat heads, making it easy to spot for removal," points out J. C. Swinbank.

Rye in wheat lowers the grade and market value of the grain, the agronomist stated.

Wheat growers who are interested in the top dollar from their crop will not tolerate plants in the field. Growers who cannot find time to rogue rye plants from their entire wheat acreage should "clean up" at least a portion of one field, harvest the area separately and preserve the clean grain for planting this fall.

Experiments at the U of Nebraska have shown that the percentage of rye will increase rapidly each year the grain mixture is planted. Thus, traces of rye in this year's crop could result in a price discount for next year's wheat crop, Swinbank concluded.

Don't Let Modern Comfort Bring Tragedy

By MRS. KAY LEIDING
Extension Home Agent

Modern electrical appliances have become commonplace in homes everywhere.

When used correctly, most appliances are perfectly safe. However, some special safety precautions must be observed. Most accidents would never occur if dangerous conditions and situations were recognized and removed.

People often become so accustomed to dangerous conditions they don't recognize the potential hazards. They know that the cord on the living room lamp has some "bare spots" but do not replace it until baby is shocked or the curtains catch fire.

Farm homemakers, more than any other group, are guilty of working when overtired and the resulting fatigue causes slow reflexes.

Some Safety Guidelines:
Disconnect the electric iron when answering the telephone so it won't burn the cover or garment.

Keep youngsters away from the washing machine when it's operating.

Teach every member of the family that a radio has no business in the bathroom. Water plus electric current can be fatal.

Metal pull chains for electric light fixtures should have a cotton string where you grasp them to avoid a short circuit through your body.

SPRING POTATOES
"New" potatoes, those small, round, flaky-skinned favorites, are in the local markets now.

Early spring potatoes, raised in Florida and similar mild winter areas, are dug before they reach full maturity and are marketed immediately. This explains the characteristic thin, flaky skins. Early potatoes are easily bruised and do not have the keeping quality of late potatoes. For best results, homemakers should buy only enough for a week or so and keep them in a cool, dark, well-ventilated place.

New potatoes do not need to be peeled, which makes them favorites for boiling and serving in the jackets. Much of the good flavor lies just under the skin, along with most of the nutritional value.

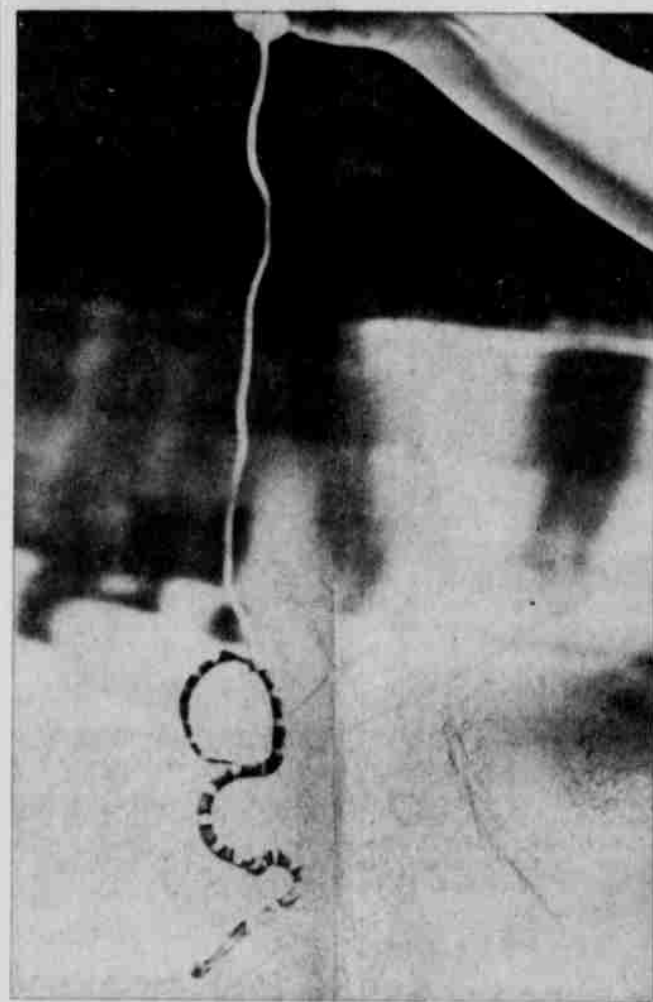

Brisk scrubbing is all that's needed to prepare them for cooking. A small chip cut off one end will let the steam escape and keep the skin from bursting.

EEEEEEH!—There were two mysteries about the snake shown above. One, how it got to Plattsmouth since it's evidently native to the Southern Coast of the U. S. Two, just what the danger was for the Courthouse employe who agreed to hold the snake for a picture. The lady's complete revulsion was a strictly female reaction and was lessened none by the fact that she'd fished the snake from a jar of alcohol with a two-foot length of wire.

'Souvenir' Of Trip Unwelcome

Mr. and Mrs. Ralph Hiner believe they brought back an unwelcome souvenir from their recent trip to Florida.

The couple returned home three weeks ago, but only this past week did they discover "said souvenir" in their yard at 423 North 8th St.

Their cats helped them discover "said souvenir" one night by fussing in the yard — Mr. Hiner went to check on the trouble with Mrs. Hiner looking on. She thought she saw a string of colored beads, but when it began to move so did Mrs. Hiner. After the kill by Mr. Hiner, they inspected their souvenir.

At first they were baffled by this 12 to 15 inch snake. It is bright orange, with bands of orange, white and black; the stomach displaying brown and white spots.

After checking an encyclopedia, they found their souvenir to be a Scarlet Snake, a member of the Coral Snake family, non-poisonous, generally found in Florida. When full grown, the Scarlet Snake usually measures 18 inches.

How they carried their passenger home is a mystery to the couple but they believe it must have stowed away in the engine compartment of their car.

The snake is on display in a jar in the Cass County Surveyor's Office.
