Drought Hits Asia, U.S., Brazil

The rains never came, and drought parched wide areas of the world in 1963.
Parts of Asia were hit hardest, the National Geographic Society says. More than 300,000 Pakistanis were forced to abandon their homes in West Pakistan to seek food and water as famine followed a prolonged dry spell.
Tin mines in Burma and Malaya were close because no water was available to wash the ore-bearing mud. Fertile rice-growing provinces on China's southeastern coast suffered the worst drought in centuries.
Reservoirs dwindle
Hong Kong reservoirs almost emptied during seven months of subnormal rainfall. Household water was severely rationed, and the entire economy of the colony suffered. Devout Chinese released fish and turtles in the sea and turned loose pet monkeys, deer, and birds on land to propitiate the spirits.
The worst drought of the century in Brazil shrank river levels to dangerous lows. Hydroelectric plants had ration power, slowing industrial production and temporarily blacking out households.
Drought or near-drought prevailed in the United States from the Great Plains to New England. In normally humid Massachusetts, the reservoir at Worcester became a dried, cracked wasteland of mud.
Seven states canceled hunting seasons and banned fires in the powder-dry woods.
New Jersey firemen fought a first fire with water drawn from an abandoned mine shaft and pumped through a half-mile of hose. They had to bypass a more convenient water supply in a nearby, but ebbing, reservoir.
In Williams, Arizona, where in normal times stockmen buy water for their herds from a coin-operated dispenser giving 250 gallons for 25 cents, the severe drought reduced a quarter's worth to 90 gallons.
Texans, who have learned to live with and laugh at drought, revived the wry story of the rancher who said, "Well, the wind blew the ranch plumb into Old Mexico, but we ain't lost everything. We get to keep the mortgage."

'4-H Youth And Nation's Agriculture'

By MARGARITE McNALLY
Nat'l 4-H Service Committee

A group of men recently had a peek at what could be a part of the U. S. farm scene 20 years hence. Among the things they "saw" were artificial lighting of entire fields making possible several harvests within a single growing season; devices to predict which eggs hatch pullets and which produce roosters; soil sterilized against plant disease and harmful weeds by mobile X-Ray units.
Fantastic—but not impossible—were electronic vegetable harvesters capable of selecting only mature crops then cleaning, grading and packaging them as the machine travels over the field; processed milk weighing a fraction of raw milk, stored without refrigeration and transported to a common market; converted salt water piped from the ocean to areas having a shortage of fresh water; farmers taking weekend rocket trips to check up on agriculture in far away places; and scores of other seemingly unbelievable developments.
Who, two decades ago, envisioned the technological changes—the mechanical, chemical and biological developments that today make our agriculture the most efficient in the world; the efficiency which enables 92 per cent of our working force to choose non-farm occupations? We can be
