SPECU. TION

How many were rained financially, how many lives were blighted and how many homes were, darkened by the recent Wall street speculative panic, will never be known nor will the awful lesson taught by the catastrophe be heeded long.

Men will continue to risk their fortunes, their happiness and the happiness of their dependants in the mad endeavor to grow rich in a day.

This is preeminently an age of vast combinations of wealth, and with us as perhaps with no other generation money-getting is the prime object of life. Education, culture and refinement must all pay tribute to our god of wealth, and worth and position are all too often reckoned by dollars and cents. It is idle to try to stem the flood-as well attempt to check an army in full retreat. But when leisure has given time for thought and the soldiers of finance realize the inevitable defeat which will stare them in the face if they return to the fray, calm reasoning may avail.

Speculation is legitimate but board of trade gambling no less than any of the petty games of professional gamblers is so nearly allied with wrong as to be almost inseparable from Lit. Strictly speaking there is no moral wrong in risking what one can afford to lose, but how few stop at this? Practically none. A first loss begets a craving for further playing of chance in hopes of "making a win"-a second leads to a third and so on until the player's funds are exhausted, his credit gone and his welcome at the gambling ring at an end.

The mar who stops gambling when he can no longer afford to lose what he risks is a rare rarity.

Speculation is not wrong for all business is speculation in a greater or less degree, and no one would think of condemning all business, but legitimate business differs from margin speculation in this that is freer from chance and the pernicious effects which chance breeds.

There is uncertainty in business just as there is in gambling or margin-speculation, but it differs in degree and differing in degree offers a greater temptation for illicit practices.

The legitimate business man depends for his success upon the confidence which he can inspire for himself and his goods, and consequently finds it to his interest to be honest in his dealings The gambler whether on board of trade or in a public or private den depends for his success upon his ability to "fleece" those with whem becomes in contact. His occupation favors dishonesty while that of the legitimate business man demands honesty.

Apart from the moral phase of the matter, the nervous strain, intense excitement and nerve wracking anxiety which attend board of trade operatiors are dangerous. Calculations made by the Chicago board of health during the fore part of the present corn deal, show that the number of deaths attributed to speculation materially increased. Men more easily succomb to the worries of beard of trade operations than to those of legitimate business.

There will always be men who will risk much to gain much, and so long as cheap. These bulls are all first class without quarter they are allowed to speculate they will undoubtedly do so. For them warnings are of no avail. Filled with a frenzy for which even they cannot account and urged on by the hope of amassing wealth without delay, they will continue to gamble under one form or another, but their folly should not To haul your be construed into a justification of TRUNKS, VALISES their practices.-South Omaha Times.
