Frank Nelson, of Kansas, was the speaker at the M. E. church Monday evening as a part of the lecture course during the Junior Normal. "Men and Books" was announced as his subject and he spent some time telling us that we ought to read good books, and after telling the women that there were too many looking glasses and that most women could tell whether a hat was the latest style that he had helped a newsboy and boot-black to lift his package on the train at Wichita, Kan., closed by telling us that we ought to help those who are so unfortunate as to not be able to help themselves. He impressed some of us with the importance of having confidence in ourselves by his frequent allusions to himself. Nelson, Nelson, Frank Nelson, Mr. Nelson. This is the message I have come to bring you.

"Oh, why should vain mortals, while toiling on earth, Be proud of their wealth or their fame? Or why should man boast of his rank or his birth, Or strive to emblazon his name?"

Nelson introduced himself to Bishop McCabe once and thought the Bishop was greater than he. He had listened to an address by the Bishop and wanted to meet him and though he had about forgotten what the Bishop had said he still remembered meeting the Bishop but didn't think the Bishop would remember meeting him.
