Hayes' Happy Family.

The seven gentlemen who make up the cabinet of President Hayes are, perhaps, as fine looking a body of men as could be got together, or as any that are to be found among the politicians of the country. Some of them, perhaps, do not boast much of their personal beauty, but what they lack in that respect is amply made up by their intellectual exa prize were to be awarded to the handsomest of them, Secretary Evarts would not, perhaps, be the lucky for championship for endless sentences and brilliant rhetoric, there would be no doubt of his coming in always planted on the back of hi head, utterly regardless of appear ance. Mr. Evarts has a keen sense of humor, and is considerable of a wit, which makes him a pleasant companion and brilliant conversationalist.

The secretary of the treasury, John Sherman, is what some people would call an iceberg. Owing to his peculiar faculty of freezing out persons who call to make applications for offices, newspaper reporters, and, in fact, all persons, find rather cold comfort in endeavoring to draw him in conversation when he is not in a talkative mood. He is one of those men who say but little, but keep up face with small eyes, sharp nose, and stern expression. His hair and being mixed with gray, and kept neatly in dark blue dress-coat cut rather long, dark trousers, standing collar, and black cravat tied in a loose, easy fashion. He generally wears a black slouch hat, but on some occasions appears in a silk beaver carefully brushed. He always walks from his house, which is not far from the treasury, to the office in the morning, going along in an ungraceful RAPID WALK, swinging a large cane with an ivory his acquaintances as he may happen to meet. He is very prompt in getin his office at 9 in the morning. Gen. Charles Devens, the attorney general, is from old Massachusetts stock and is a very affable, pleasant gentleman. He is very approachable and easy in conversation, and polite to those who call on him. He is a heavily-built man of about six
