AT THE END. 'I am so tired!' The flute-like voice that uttered this petulant exclamation broke thro' the fragrant stillness of the autumnal evening.

He stood over her, his hands folded on his back, and his broad, bronzed brow flushed a little with some sudden inward emotion.

'I am not changed,' Elsie tried to steady her voice. 'I am the same to-day that I have been every day for years.'

It was Nathaniel's turn to blush now, which he did to perfection. For an answer he drew the dogwood berries out of the little hands, and held the slender fingers in his own.

'A divorced man, Nathaniel,' Elsie cried, lifting her eyebrows slightly, although her cheeks were dyed with burning blushes and her lips trembled nervously.

'His wife was too good for him, Elsie. Take warning and do not listen to his sophistries, for, believe me, he is not worth a good woman's esteem.'

Nathaniel watched her with a brooding tenderness. He was so loyal himself that he would instinctively notice any wavering on Elsie's part, he thought, yet the eyes of love are often blinded by self-confidence.

How to Make Children Obey. In the first place, says Mrs. Rancher, do not forbid a child any pleasure unless there is good reason for doing so.

Humor in the Family. Good humor is rightly reckoned a most valuable aid to happy home life. An equally good and useful faculty is a sense of humor.

Curran as an Orator. The following is Curran's description of his first appearance at a debating society:

Economy, Old Girl. An Old City man was sitting in his parlor reading the other day, when he heard footsteps approaching.

An Independent Farmer. A renter (a white man) on a farm near Raymond, Miss., has a wife and seven children.
