Probably the most disastrous flood that has ever occurred in the momory of the oldest settlers in these parts from any cause happened in the spring of 1867. Mr. John Rickly who distinctly remembers the incidents connected with the cause and the results, says that the winter was very much such as the past months of the present winter have been, except that, as he thinks, more snow fell, and there was not so much continued cold weather; but the ice in the rivers is probably not as thick now as it was in the corresponding month of that season, owing to the fact that it was built upon at night from the surface by the water which ran over it during the day, this forming layer after layer after both rivers were in many places frozen to the bottom. The direct cause of the overflow of the Loupe at that time was a gorge at the U. P. railroad bridge, west of the city, the water forcing its way out over the bottom and through the road bed, which acted only as a short impediment to the water on its way down the course of the river. More serious results, however, were brought about by another gorge forming near Buck Island, below the city, while the water was tempo rarily dammed by the gorge and the railroad embankment above The water set back from this point, and being met by the downward rush of the flood from above, cover ed the bottom in most places to the depth of several feet, in a very shor time. This happened in the latter part of the month of March or the first of April, with warm rains prevailing, causing a sudden rupture of the ice above. The main causes of the gorge at the bridge, and which the overflow, have no comparison with the present condition of things, as the structure mentioned was at that time a temporary pile concern. with comparatively no water way, and the inevitable result of a sudden bridge or a gorge.
