That Herd Law. EDITOR JOURNAL : In the Schuyler Sun of a recent date there is a communication on the subject of Senator | To S. A. Bonesteel, L. Gerrard, M. Whitpresent and delivered the following Turner's amendment to the herd law, over the signature of "F." I should be sorry to give an unfair definition to the capital, but it seems to stand for Fault-finder, for I cannot believe any person who will give the subject the thought it demands, or even deserves, but will see its wisdom for the future, and its imperative justice for the present. As a matter of public policy, independent of its individual right of protection to our meadow lands, shows the wisdom of its enactment. Prior to the adoption of the general herd law in 1871, the statute books were covered all over with local herd laws, enacted to suit the neighborhood in which it was desired, and were as often as varied in their operation as the locality diversified in penalties and restrictions, fostering bitterness of feeling and angry litigation. The enactment of the general law wiped out the feuds of the past, and has worked so admirably that nearly every agricultural writer who has visited our state for the purpose of learning the operation of the herd law, has commended it as a grand advance in economising the expenditure of opening up new farms. It is no surprise, then, that the herd law, with Senator Turner's amendment, "receives so much approval on the part of newspaper men;" they are the faithful heralds of our advantages, and are ever on the offence.
