MARRYING A FARMER.

"There is no use in reasoning any more; my mind is made up! I will not marry a farmer! All your arguments are of no account."

"I am sorry, Jennie, you are so determined."

"Mother, do you want your child to go through life as you have done—toil from morning till night, and sometimes half of the night besides—sick or well, no odds—delve, work, all the time?"

"All farmers' families are not situated just as ours has been; you know your father—"

"Yes, I know all about it, he loves his cattle and horses far more than he does his children, and he is ten times more careful of his old mare than he is of his wife—the mother of his children."

"Jennie! Jennie! You ought not to speak so."

"But, mother dear, it is the truth; you can not deny it! Haven't I eyes? We girls can see the case as plain as day. Old Doll has nice rolls, and she must not be worked. Bless me! it might hurt the colt to drive the old mare to the village, she must be fed high and live at her ease; but his wife; no danger of hurting her babies or her either! No wonder the baby is sick and fretful, when poor mother is overheated, overworked from morning till night, not one hour to rest all day; and just as soon as we girls are large enough to help you, we have to run for the turkeys, drive the cows, feed the pigs, and leave you to toil on alone. It is a burrowing shame!"

"Jennie, your father does not look at it as you do."

"It is high time he did; and I am going to give him a chance, before I leave home, too."

"Leave home, child! Where are you going?"

"Somewhere. Yes, I shall be eighteen next month, and I am going to see if there is a place where one can have an hour's rest, to enjoy reading."

"My child, how can I spare you—that will baby do?"

"If I am away, Etta will take my place, instead of working out-of-doors as much as she does now—it will be better for her. A man has no business to make a girl work as she has to. Don't you think it would be easier for her if I was away?"

"Oh dear, my child, I can not see how it will be. I do not think your father will like it. Does George know how you feel? And the poor woman sighed heavily."

"Yes, mother, I told him last night; he thinks his wife would have an easier time than you have had; but a farmer's wife is a slave; her work is never done. Mother, if George Hartwell was anything but a farmer, I think I could love him enough to marry him; but as it is, I would rather remain an old maid to the end of my life."

"You do not object to him—only his occupation?"

"That is all; I really think he is very pleasant! Just then Mr. Wells's voice rang out from the top of the log of hay which was being drawn into the barn."

"Jennie, its time to get the cows. You girls will have to do the chores, for we must get in three more loads of hay to-night."

"Jennie knew what that meant; she and her sister Etta had the cows to drive from the pasture, more than half a mile off; twelve cows to tie up and milk; eight hogs to feed; milk to strain; feed the turkeys, count and feed them; chickens to feed and shut up in their coops; two horses to water, feed and bed down, and a supper to get for four men; and it was now about 8 o'clock! She laid her work down and with compressed lips, joined her sister, who sat on the door-step fanning herself with her hat; her pleasant face was sunburnt, covered with perspiration and dirt, and the tears were trickling down her cheeks."

"What is it, Etta darling? Don't cry; I will bring you a basin of water and the towel, and you rest. I will get the cows alone. Poor little sister!"

"I am tired almost to death, Jennie! It is not going to rain! They are going to gain time to go to the bear-hunt to-morrow. I never can milk the cows to-night, I'm so tired."

"Sit and rest; you feel better now, you have bathed."

"Some of the Hartwells have more hay out than we have, and their milking is done, and the girls did not have to do it either; the girls did not rake after the cart over there; they have a better time."

"Etta had better take care and rest on the settee, Jennie, while you are gone for the cows," said the mother softly from the sitting-room, as Jennie started from the door.

"Yes, Etta, go in! He can not see you in the house when he goes back—so he won't set you to work."

The poor, tired girl went in doors, and Jennie walked with a brisk step towards the pasture.

Mr. Wells was a well-to-do farmer. He inherited from his father a snug farm, well stocked, and in good cultivation. He was a fine looking man, and was considered the best match in town; so when he married the minister's eldest daughter every one thought she was a fortunate girl—such a nice home, so smart a husband, and so well off too! So thought the young bride for a while but that was before she knew what was before her.

Though she never complained, she did not think so now, neither had she been of that opinion but a few months after her marriage. She was a perfect slave, both soul and body, held in bondage by Ezra Wells. He would have been astonished if any one had told him that he was a tyrant in his family; that his children did not love him; that his wife was afraid of him; but yet this was the truth. Property was all he cared for; to have the best crops, the fattest cattle, the best horses, and make the most butter and cheese, of any man in town, was his highest ambition, and every person and thing had to be subservient to this end. His four eldest children were girls; the next two boys died in infancy; then came a boy, a delicate child always, with a spinal weakness that disabled him from labor. Two other boy-babies followed, so frail that they passed from earth with their first breath, and the weary mother would have followed them but for the strong mother-love she bore to her living children. When Jennie was 16 another little girl made its advent, and now was just able to walk when another son came into the household. Mrs. Wells was very delicate in health, and as Jessie said, she was not half as well treated as the high-blooded mare that fed at leisure in the meadow pasture, with her beautiful colt capering around her side; that was worth money! A younger sister of Mrs. Wells, who had married a mechanic, had frequently paid her short visits and saw with deep regret the hard lot that had fallen to her sister. She even remonstrated with her brother-in-law when he told her he was going to purchase another farm, as she saw it would increase the burdens of her poor sister, who was already loaded down with labor and care; and he did consent to let his invalid son go to live with her, so he could be benefited by the sea air and bathing, not thinking his wife wished him to go for fear his father would work him too hard and destroy what little vitality he possessed. It was to pay for this farm that Wells was in debt. His family were pinched in dress and comfort, every luxury was denied them, and it was as Jennie said, delve and delve from morning till night. After the girls were old enough to work they were kept from school, and had not their aunt kindly sent them books, and their mother been capable of instructing them, they would have been deplorably ignorant. If they went to church, they had to walk for the horses were too valuable to stand hitched; they might get frightened and break loose, and it would never do for girls to drive the mare, it would ruin the colt, or he would get cast, or hung, or something else would happen; so they seldom enjoyed the privilege of Sunday-school or sanctuary. Mr. Hartwell, their nearest neighbor, used to say that if Mrs. Wells were not an angel, the children would grow up perfect heathens, and he always managed to find something pleasant in his papers and magazines for Mrs. Wells and the girls to read; or if he purchased a new book it found its way to Mrs. Wells, and his only son, George, was generally the messenger who carried it over. Both Mr. and Mrs. Hartwell were acquainted with her before her marriage, and the memory of her father, who "sundered in the peaceful churchyard, was very precious to them, and they tried by every means in their power to lighten the heavy load that was placed upon her.

George Hartwell did not quite despair of changing Jennie's opinion with regard to marrying a farmer, and held frequent consultations with his mother upon the subject. One morning he quite astonished his father by suggesting that he should like to take his sisters and go to Connecticut to visit some cousins, provided he could get some one to help mother while they were gone; he had been thinking of it for some time. The girls were delighted with the plan, and thought, perhaps, Jennie Wells would come and stop with them, and assist while they were gone. So, after breakfast, Mr. Hartwell went over to see if it could be arranged. Mrs. Wells thought she could spare her if her sister could be allowed to take her place; and so, after a good many contrary arguments, from their father, it was decided that for three dollars a week Jennie might go and stay with the Hartwells, while the young people went on their pleasure excursion. These five weeks were the most delightful days of Jennie's whole life. She saw that all farmers' girls, or wives, were not slaves, and that the sunshine that never illuminated her own home beamed brightly in the kitchen and parlor of her new station.

"How I wish our home was as pleasant!" she exclaimed to Mrs. Hartwell, as she was watering the bright flowers that had been here each day; "I do love flowers so much, but father will not allow us to have one in any place; and you have everything so easy and convenient about the work! You have no idea of the difference; my mother would so like to have things arranged as you have them, but father—"

"I know all about it, Jennie! We all love our home, and try to make it pleasant; and I am glad you have had a chance to see that farmers' daughters can be as happy as any girls; can have just as many pleasant things, and just as good times, as any class of people in the world. There are exceptions, of course, but for myself, Jennie, I would rather be a farmer's wife than the wife of either a merchant or professional man, or be an old maid."

A bright blush mantled over Jennie's face as she bent it over a beautiful monthly rose; "George has told you," and the tears started in her eyes.

"Yes, dear, and I did not wonder you felt so, either. The love of money has clouded your young life, and I thought if you could see, day after day, how happy we are, and how pleasant our home is, you would feel differently; so we planned the visit for the young folks for your own pleasure; I could think of no other way to get you here for a few weeks, and I think you are not sorry to have had a change!"

"Oh, I have been so happy! Every thing is so different from what it is at home. I shall never forget these pleasant weeks; such glorious rides with you; and going to church on the Sabbath; and so many pleasant things!"

"My dear, I hope you will enjoy a great many more of our pleasures with us, now that you
