In answer: our inquirer will find the Nebraska law on the subject at utes: "the owners of cattle, horses, mules, swine and sheep in this state, shall hereafter be liable for all damage done by such stock upon the cultivated lands in this state, &c." The subsequent sections provide that the person damaged may have a lien upon such trespassing animals, for the full amount of damages and costs, but does not leave him the sole arbiter of his own damage. It is lawful for him to notify the owner of the stock of the amount of damage claimed, and that he holds the of which proved fatal, and several stock; also naming an arbitrator in case the amount of damages is not satisfactory to the owner of the stock; in which case he may name an arbitrator and they two a third, whose decision may be filed with a justice and operate as a judgment. A law of '79, page 165, provides, "No cattle, horses, mules, swine or sheep shall run at large during the night time, between sunset and sunrise, in the state of Nebraska, and the owner or owners of any such animal shall be liable in an action for damages done during such night time." THE Omaha Republican gives some timely hints upon the subject of electricity, wire fence and stock. It claims many more fatalities from ses wandered on to my neighbors lightning this year in Nebraska than farm, he found them and put them in any former year. A wire fence does not afford much protection in a driving storm, but the animals imagine it does, and proceed accordingly to take refuge there. The account published recently of the killing of sixty-five head of sheep by a single stroke of lightning, and now another that in Dixon county eight or ten head of cattle were killed by a single bolt. In these cases the animals were seeking protection from the storm alongside of the wire fence. In view of the losses farmers and stock growers are sustaining, would it not be better to do away with wire fences altogether, reasons the Republican.

An Excellent Suggestion.

MR. EDITOR: There is one subject I wish to call your attention. It is the importance of boring or drilling one or two holes in Platte county to test if coal is not to be found there. This village has contracted with a man to put down a drill hole twenty-five hundred feet in order to obtain a flowing well to supply the town. They are now down twentyfour hundred feet, and water pouring out of it at the rate of 100 gallons per minute. In my opinion this is question for the county instead of a few farmers combining to do it. If Nance and Platte counties would give the required amount of bonds and get the man who is at work here to put down a drill hole about two thousand feet, they would do a good thing. The people have money to give corporations. Have they none to bore for coal for themselves? It would not cost much if the counties of Nance and Platte would go equal parts and drill on the boundsry of the counties. There are three veins of coal here. Yours truly,
