Dr. BLISS and his associates have seen fit to make a statement of their services in the Garfield case, without making a definite bill, leaving it to the committee in charge to say what those services shall be worth. This brings the matter under discussion by the public. It occurs to us to say proof in support of his claim, and that their bill as in ordinary cases, making all reasonable allowance for their time, trouble, loss of practice, anxiety, &c. If they had even placed their compensation at two or three times that in ordinary cases, we apprehend that the general public would not make serious objection. but as it is, their action is subject to various constructions or misconstructions. As a business proposition, don't they know what their services were actually worth? Do they think that the committee is better able to judge than they are? Are they afraid that some might raise the question of mal-practice, and prove that what they did was injurious rather than beneficial? Or, on the other hand, have they an exalted notion of the value of their services. and are too modest to say just what was the portion of a pig's hide which they were worth? Do they imagine he wished to get tanned. The skin that respect and love for the dead president will impel the people to pay a sentimental price for their services, in addition to what they would ordinarily be worth?

It would seem that the managing physician apprehends that he can, in this way, secure the largest pay, and have the least adverse criticism-but it is not "business," unless, indeed, he has some assurance from the committee, or some means of "making assurance doubly sure," in either or any of which cases, the plain, right way has not been considered. Many good American citizens suspect this man of unprofessional deeds in the ex-president's illness, and this recent act will lead these to believe that there is jobbery in these bills.
